

EC NT

PHILIPPIANS

SECOND EDITION

BAKER EXEGETICAL
COMMENTARY ON THE NEW TESTAMENT

MOISÉS SILVA

PHILIPPIANS

SECOND EDITION

MOISÉS SILVA

Baker Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament

B Baker Academic
Grand Rapids, Michigan

©1992, 2005 by Moisés Silva

Published by Baker Academic a division of Baker Publishing Group
P.O. Box 6287, Grand Rapids, MI 49516-6287 www.bakeracademic.com

Ebook edition created 2014

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means—for example, electronic, photocopy, recording—without the prior written permission of the publisher. The only exception is brief quotations in printed reviews.

ISBN 978-1-4412-0247-5

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data is on file at the Library of Congress, Washington, DC.

A mis queridos padres

Contents

Cover

Series Page

Title Page

Copyright Page

Dedication

Series Preface

Author's Preface to the Second Edition

Author's Preface to the First Edition

Abbreviations

Transliteration

Map

Introduction to Philippians

I. Opening (1:1–11)

II. Paul's Missionary Report (1:12–26)

A. Paul's Circumstances (1:12–17)

B. Paul's Attitude (1:18–26)

III. A Call to Sanctification (1:27–2:30)

A. Christian Citizenship (1:27–2:4)

B. Christian Humility (2:5–11)

C. Christian Obedience (2:12–18)

D. Resumption of Paul's Missionary Report (2:19–30)

IV. Doctrinal Polemics (3:1–4:1)

A. Judaizers as the Context for Theology (3:1–6)

B. The Essence of Pauline Theology (3:7–11)

C. Practical Theology (3:12–4:1)

V. Final Concerns (4:2–23)

A. Exhortations (4:2–9)

B. A Word of Thanks (4:10–20)

C. Closing (4:21–23)

Excursus: Scribal Tendencies in the Pauline Epistles

Works Cited

Index of Subjects

Index of Authors

Index of Greek Words

Index of Scripture and Other Ancient Writings

Notes

About the Author

Series Preface

The chief concern of the Baker Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament (to be known as BECNT) is to provide, within the framework of informed evangelical thought, commentaries that blend scholarly depth with readability, exegetical detail with sensitivity to the whole, attention to critical problems with theological awareness. We hope thereby to attract the interest of a fairly wide audience, from the scholar who is looking for a thoughtful and independent examination of the text to the motivated lay Christian who craves for a solid but accessible exposition.

Nevertheless, a major purpose is to address the needs of pastors and others who are involved in the preaching and exposition of the Scriptures as the uniquely inspired Word of God. This consideration affects directly the parameters of the series. For example, serious biblical expositors cannot afford to depend on a superficial treatment that avoids the difficult questions, but neither are they interested in encyclopedic commentaries that seek to cover every conceivable issue that may arise. Our aim, therefore, is to focus on those problems that have a direct bearing on the meaning of the text (although selected technical details are usually treated in the additional notes).

Similarly, a special effort is made to avoid treating exegetical questions for their own sake, that is, in relative isolation from the thrust of the argument as a whole. This effort may involve (at the discretion of the individual contributors) abandoning the verse-by-verse approach in favor of an exposition that focuses on the paragraph as the main unit of thought. In all cases, however, the commentaries will stress the development of the argument and explicitly relate each passage to what precedes and follows it so as to identify its function in context as clearly as possible.

We believe, moreover, that a responsible exegetical commentary must take fully into account the latest scholarly research, regardless of its source. The attempt to do this in the context of a conservative theological tradition presents certain challenges, and in the past the results have not always been commendable. In some cases, evangelicals appear to make use of critical scholarship not for the purpose of genuine interaction but only to dismiss it. In other cases, the interaction glides over into assimilation, theological distinctives are ignored or suppressed, and the end product cannot be differentiated from works that arise from a fundamentally different starting point.

The contributors to this series attempt to avoid these two pitfalls. They do not consider traditional opinions to be sacrosanct, and they are certainly committed to do justice to the biblical text whether or not it supports such opinions. On the other hand, they will not quickly abandon a long-standing view, if there is persuasive evidence in its favor, for the sake of fashionable theories. What is more important, the contributors share a belief in the trustworthiness and essential unity of Scripture. They also consider that the historic formulations of Christian doctrine, such as the ecumenical creeds and many of the documents originating in the sixteenth-century Reformation, arise from a legitimate reading of Scripture, thus providing a proper framework for its further interpretation. No doubt, the use of such a starting point sometimes results in the imposition of a foreign construct on the text, but we deny that it must necessarily do so or that the writers who claim to approach the text without prejudices are invulnerable to the same danger.

Accordingly, we do not consider theological assumptions—from which, in any case, no commentator is free—to be obstacles for biblical interpretation. On the contrary, an exegete who hopes to understand the apostle Paul in a theological vacuum might just as easily try to interpret Aristotle without regard for the philosophical framework of his whole work or without having recourse to those subsequent philosophical categories that make possible a meaningful contextualization of his thought. It must be emphasized, however, that the contributors to the present series come from a variety of theological traditions and that they do not all have identical views with regard to the proper implementation of these general principles. In the end, all that really matters is whether the series succeeds in representing the original text accurately, clearly, and meaningfully to the contemporary reader.

Shading has been used to assist the reader in locating the introductory comments for each section. Textual variants in the Greek text are signaled in the author's translation by means of half-brackets around the relevant word or phrase (e.g., "Gerasenes"), thereby alerting the reader to turn to the additional notes at the end of each exegetical unit for a discussion of the textual problem. The documentation uses the author-date method, in which the basic reference consists of author's surname + year + page number(s) (e.g., Fitzmyer 1981: 297). The only exceptions to this system are well-known reference works (e.g., BDAG, LSJ, TDNT). Full publication data and a complete set of indexes can be found at the end of the volume.

Robert Yarbrough

Robert H. Stein

Author's Preface to the Second Edition

The present commentary first appeared, at the end of 1988, as part of the Wycliffe Exegetical Commentary series. It was then reprinted in 1992, with minor corrections, as the initial volume of the BECNT series, which has since adopted some changes (e.g., the use of the author-date system). The opportunity to revise the commentary has made it possible not only to bring its structure and formatting into consistency with more recent volumes in the series but also to update the material by taking into account works published during the last fifteen years. My Philippians bibliography for that period, however, contains almost two hundred new items, most of which make a genuine contribution to our understanding of the letter. How to integrate so much new research is a challenging problem.

The initial publication of the commentary had a very positive reception, but I was particularly gratified by comments from a number of pastors who found it especially helpful in their study and preaching. It thus seemed advisable not to change its character by overloading the exposition with scholarly suggestions. Indeed, readers of this commentary are best served by having their attention drawn to selected works only (even so, close to one hundred new titles receive mention). The introductory chapter contains two addenda that summarize recent publications (these will be found at the end of the sections titled "Literary Structure" and "Exegetical History"). Otherwise, interaction with newer scholarship is mostly relegated to the footnotes.

This approach means that the exposition itself remains largely unaltered. While numerous stylistic improvements have been made (mainly for the sake of greater clarity), these are usually of minor significance. At a few points a different interpretation has been adopted (e.g., see the second additional note on 2:1), and in a few other places I feel less certain than I previously did; but my understanding of major issues, and of the letter as a whole, has not changed. The many additions in the footnotes, however, should allow readers to use the material with greater awareness of alternate options.

I am deeply indebted to my former research assistant, David L. Palmer, for compiling an extensive list of items that required attention, based on his careful reading of the first edition and on a detailed comparison with the commentaries by O'Brien and Fee.

As I complete this revision, my sense of inadequacy in seeking to expound the text of Philippians is even more acute than it was fifteen years ago. To the extent that any readers find help in this work, the effort will be amply rewarded.

Author's Preface to the First Edition

The distinctive features of the Baker Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament have made it possible for me to put into practice a few ideas about commentary writing that I have entertained for some time.

Traditionally, exegetical commentaries have been treated primarily as reference works, to be consulted for information on a few verses or even on isolated words and phrases. Since no commentator can anticipate all of the questions that may occur to Bible readers, students often experience disappointment that the commentaries do not address these questions specifically. More seriously, the verse-by-verse approach of the typical commentary, in spite of its obvious advantages, can become a hindrance to faithful exposition whenever it leads to an atomistic handling of the text—treating problems in relative isolation from each other at the expense of the main teaching of the passage.

My attempt in this volume has been to focus exclusively on the thrust of the text itself, to ask continually what is distinctive to Philippians, to determine how each passage contributes to the argument of the letter as a whole, to avoid being distracted by extraneous problems, and to communicate clearly the results of my research by means of uncluttered exposition. Others will have to evaluate to what extent I have been successful in this endeavor, but at least they will know what are the criteria that have guided my work. According to the guidelines for the series, each section of the commentary consists of the following three parts:

Translation. Because of the widespread use of the NASB and the NIV in evangelical circles, I have assumed that users of this commentary have access to both. My translation of Philippians does not attempt to compete with them—it certainly makes no claim to being either literal (for which the NASB is valuable) or literate (a fine NIV quality). Instead, I have attempted a full rendering, largely a paraphrase, that seeks to summarize the results of the exegesis. I have used brackets generously to include interpretive material.

Exegesis and Exposition. Hoping to meet the goals mentioned above, I have chosen to write “exegetical essays” on carefully defined units of thought. These essays, of course, do not overlook detailed problems of text, language, and interpretation; it is simply that the problems are discussed only to the extent that they have a bearing on the thrust of the passage being considered. The exposition, therefore, is not designed to provide quick answers; rather, it is designed to be read in blocks—the larger the block, the better. Some hardy souls may even wish to read through the whole exposition and thus benefit the most from the distinctive concerns of the commentary. In any case, the reader is strongly encouraged to look carefully at the introductory comments of a section before attempting to evaluate the interpretation of a particular word or clause.

Additional Notes. This section preserves some of the benefits of verse-by-verse exegesis, namely, ease of reference and attention to details that are of lesser importance for understanding the passage. Sometimes, however, these notes include discussions that, while hardly unimportant, would have unnecessarily cluttered the exposition. In these cases, the essays contain a summary of the argumentation and a reference to the additional material.

I am grateful to Kenneth L. Barker and John S. Feinberg for reading through an early draft of the commentary and giving useful advice. Richard B. Gaffin Jr., from whom I learned to regard the apostle Paul as theologian, also read and evaluated the typescript; his encouragement is greatly appreciated.

Billie Goodenough and Dorothy Krieke initially transcribed this commentary from a hopeless handwritten draft; their faithful and careful work made much easier the process of revision. Dan G. McCartney ran a few GRAMCORD programs related to the text of Philippians; I also benefited from his advice on several exegetical problems. My student assistant Christopher N. Mount offered invaluable help in the last stages of the project.

Finally, I feel I must offer my apologies to my wife and children—especially to John, who often had to give up playing his drums so that his dad could work on the computer—for bearing the brunt of this long undertaking.

Writing a biblical commentary can be a humbling experience, and doubly so when the text being commented upon touches as intensely as Philippians does on the doctrine of sanctification (manifested especially by humility!).

Who is sufficient for these things?

Abbreviations

Bibliographic and General

| | |
|------------------|---|
| BDAG | A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature , by W. Bauer, F. W. Danker, W. F. Arndt, and F. W. Gingrich, 3rd ed. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000) |
| BDF | A Greek Grammar of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature , by F. Blass, A. Debrunner, and R. W. Funk (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961) |
| BDR | Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch , by F. Blass, A. Debrunner, and F. Rehkopf, 16th ed. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1984) |
| GNB | Good News Bible/Today's English Version |
| HDB | A Dictionary of the Bible , edited by J. Hastings, 5 vols. (New York: Scribner, 1902–4) |
| HF | The Greek New Testament according to the Majority Text , edited by Zane C. Hodges and Arthur L. Farstad (Nashville: Nelson, 1982) |
| KJV | King James Version |
| LCL | Loeb Classical Library |
| LSJ | A Greek-English Lexicon , by H. G. Liddell, R. Scott, and H. S. Jones (Oxford: Clarendon, 1968) |
| LXX | Septuagint |
| MM | The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament: Illustrated from the Papyri and Other Non-literary Sources , by J. H. Moulton and G. Milligan (reprinted Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1976) |
| MT | Masoretic Text |
| NA ²⁷ | Novum Testamentum Graece , edited by [E. and E. Nestle], |

| | |
|------------------|---|
| | B. and K. Aland, J. Karavidopoulos, C. M. Martini, and B. M. Metzger, 27th rev. ed. (Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1993) |
| NASB | New American Standard Bible |
| NBE | Nueva Biblia Española |
| NEB | New English Bible |
| NIDNTT | The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology , edited by L. Coenen, E. Beyreuther, and H. Bietenhard; English translation edited by C. Brown, 4 vols. (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1975–86) |
| NIV | New International Version |
| NJB | New Jerusalem Bible |
| NKJV | New King James Version |
| NPNF | A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers of the Christian Church , edited by Philip Schaff, 1st series (reprinted Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979) |
| NRSV | New Revised Standard Version |
| NT | New Testament |
| OCD | The Oxford Classical Dictionary , edited by S. Hornblower and A. Spawforth, 3rd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996) |
| OT | Old Testament |
| OTP | The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha , edited by J. H. Charlesworth, 2 vols. (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1983–85) |
| PG | Patrologiae cursus completus: Series graeca , edited by J.-P. Migne, 161 vols. (Paris, 1857–66) |
| PL | Patrologiae cursus completus: Series latina , edited by J.-P. Migne, 221 vols. (Paris, 1844–64) |
| s.v. | sub voce (under the word) |
| TDNT | Theological Dictionary of the New Testament , edited by G. Kittel and G. Friedrich; translated and edited by G. W. Bromiley, 10 vols. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1964–76) |
| UBS ⁴ | The Greek New Testament , edited by B. Aland, K. Aland, |

J. Karavidopoulos, C. M. Martini, and B. M. Metzger, 4th rev. ed., 2nd printing (Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1994)

v.l. varia lectio (variant reading)

WW Novum Testamentum Domini Nostri Iesu Christi Latine: Secundum editionem Sancti Hieronymi, edited by J. Wordsworth, H. J. White, et al., 3 vols. (Oxford: Clarendon, 1889–1954)

Hebrew Bible

| | |
|----------|---------------|
| Gen. | Genesis |
| Exod. | Exodus |
| Lev. | Leviticus |
| Num. | Numbers |
| Deut. | Deuteronomy |
| Josh. | Joshua |
| Judg. | Judges |
| Ruth | Ruth |
| 1 Sam. | 1 Samuel |
| 2 Sam. | 2 Samuel |
| 1 Kings | 1 Kings |
| 2 Kings | 2 Kings |
| 1 Chron. | 1 Chronicles |
| 2 Chron. | 2 Chronicles |
| Ezra | Ezra |
| Neh. | Nehemiah |
| Esth. | Esther |
| Job | Job |
| Ps. | Psalms |
| Prov. | Proverbs |
| Eccles. | Ecclesiastes |
| Song | Song of Songs |

| | |
|-------|--------------|
| Isa. | Isaiah |
| Jer. | Jeremiah |
| Lam. | Lamentations |
| Ezek. | Ezekiel |
| Dan. | Daniel |
| Hos. | Hosea |
| Joel | Joel |
| Amos | Amos |
| Obad. | Obadiah |
| Jon. | Jonah |
| Mic. | Micah |
| Nah. | Nahum |
| Hab. | Habakkuk |
| Zeph. | Zephaniah |
| Hag. | Haggai |
| Zech. | Zechariah |
| Mal. | Malachi |

Greek Testament

| | |
|--------|---------------|
| Matt. | Matthew |
| Mark | Mark |
| Luke | Luke |
| John | John |
| Acts | Acts |
| Rom. | Romans |
| 1 Cor. | 1 Corinthians |
| 2 Cor. | 2 Corinthians |
| Gal. | Galatians |
| Eph. | Ephesians |
| Phil. | Philippians |
| Col. | Colossians |
| | |

| | |
|----------|-----------------|
| 1 Thess. | 1 Thessalonians |
| 2 Thess. | 2 Thessalonians |
| 1 Tim. | 1 Timothy |
| 2 Tim. | 2 Timothy |
| Titus | Titus |
| Philem. | Philemon |
| Heb. | Hebrews |
| James | James |
| 1 Pet. | 1 Peter |
| 2 Pet. | 2 Peter |
| 1 John | 1 John |
| 2 John | 2 John |
| 3 John | 3 John |
| Jude | Jude |
| Rev. | Revelation |

Other Jewish and Christian Writings

| | |
|--------------------|--|
| Ag. Ap. | Josephus, Against Apion |
| Apoc. Mos. | Apocalypse of Moses |
| 1 Clem. | 1 Clement |
| 2 Clem. | 2 Clement |
| Conf. Tong. | Philo, On the Confusion of Tongues |
| Diogn. | Diognetus |
| Gaius | Philo, On the Embassy to Gaius |
| Herm. Sim. | Shepherd of Hermas, Similitude |
| Hist. eccl | Eusebius, Historia ecclesiastica (Ecclesiastical History) |
| Ign. Phld | Ignatius, Letter to the Philadelphians |
| Ign. Rom | Ignatius, Letter to the Romans |
| Ign. Smyrn | Ignatius, Letter to the Smyrnaeans |
| m. Yebam | Mishnah tractate, Yebamot |
| Sir. | Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) |

| | |
|---------------|---|
| Strom. | Clement of Alexandria, Stromata (Miscellanies) |
| T. Sim. | Testament of Simeon |
| Wis. | Wisdom of Solomon |

Classical Writers

| | |
|--------------------|--|
| Bibl. hist. | Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca historica |
| Disc. | Epictetus, Discourses |
| Hermot. | Lucian, Hermotimus |
| Hist. | various authors, Histories |

Greek Transliteration

| | |
|-----|-------|
| α | a |
| β | b |
| γ | g (n) |
| δ | d |
| ε | e |
| ζ | z |
| η | ē |
| θ | th |
| ι | i |
| κ | k |
| λ | l |
| μ | m |
| ν | n |
| ξ | x |
| ο | o |
| π | p |
| ρ | r |
| σ ζ | s |
| τ | t |
| υ | y (u) |
| φ | ph |
| χ | ch |
| ψ | ps |
| ω | ō |
| ‘ | h |

Notes on the transliteration of Greek

1. Accents, lenis (smooth breathing), and iota subscript are not shown in transliteration.
2. The transliteration of asper (rough breathing) precedes a vowel or diphthong (e.g., ἄ = ha; αἶ = hai) and follows ρ (i.e., ῥ = rh).
3. Gamma is transliterated n only when it precedes γ, κ, ξ, or χ.
4. Upsilon is transliterated u only when it is part of a diphthong (i.e., αυ, ευ, ου, υι).

Hebrew Transliteration

| | | |
|----|---|-------|
| א | ʾ | |
| ב | b | |
| ג | g | |
| ד | d | |
| ה | h | |
| ו | w | |
| ז | z | |
| ח | ḥ | |
| ט | ṭ | |
| י | y | |
| כ | k | |
| ל | l | |
| מ | m | |
| נ | n | |
| ס | s | |
| ע | ʿ | |
| פ | p | |
| צ | ṣ | |
| ק | q | |
| ר | r | |
| | ś | |
| | š | |
| ת | t | |
| בֿ | ā | qāmeṣ |

| | | |
|----|---|---------------------------------|
| ַ | a | pataḥ |
| ְ | a | furtive pataḥ |
| ֿ | e | sěgôl |
| ִ | ē | șērê |
| ִ | i | short ḥîreq |
| ִ | ī | long ḥîreq written defectively |
| ֿ | o | qāmeṣ ḥāṭûp |
| וּ | ô | ḥôlem written fully |
| וּ | ō | ḥôlem written defectively |
| וּ | û | șûreq |
| ֿ | u | short qibbûṣ |
| ֿ | ū | long qibbûṣ written defectively |
| ֹה | â | final qāmeṣ hē' (ֹ = āh) |
| ֵי | ê | sěgôl yôd (ֵ = êy) |
| ִי | ê | șērê yôd (ִ = êy) |
| ִי | î | ḥîreq yôd (ִ = îy) |
| ֶ | ă | ḥāṭēp pataḥ |
| ֶ | ě | ḥāṭēp sěgôl |
| ֶ | ǒ | ḥāṭēp qāmeṣ |
| ֶ | ě | vocal šěwā' |
| ֶ | - | silent šěwā' |

Notes on the transliteration of Hebrew

1. Accents are not shown in transliteration.
2. Silent šěwā', is not indicated in transliteration.
3. The unaspirated forms of פ פת ב ג ד are not specially indicated in transliteration.
4. Dāgeš forte is indicated by doubling the consonant. Dāgeš present for euphonious reasons is not indicated in transliteration.

5. Maqqēp is represented by a hyphen.

Introduction to Philippians

The primary purpose of this introductory chapter is to help the reader approach exegetical problems in the Epistle to the Philippians by providing a broad interpretive framework. No textual detail ought to be interpreted in isolation from the larger context of which it is a part, yet it would be tiresome and impractical to review such broader concerns at every relevant point in the commentary. This chapter should thus be regarded as an intrinsic part of the exposition.

On the other hand, this material represents, for the most part, conclusions drawn from the exegesis. The summary that follows, therefore, is deliberately brief and seldom accompanied by substantive argumentation. The reader is referred to the relevant sections in the commentary itself for further detail.

Historical Context

When we insist that exegesis, to be valid, must pay attention to the context, we usually mean the literary context—and, in particular, the material that immediately precedes and follows the passage in question. We are seldom aware, however, that the life-setting of the document is just as important for proper interpretation.^[1] The Epistle to the Philippians did not appear out of a time-space vacuum; it was written by a historical person to a historical church in a particular historical period, and every effort must be made to identify those historical features as precisely as possible.

A number of those features are not in dispute. The document was certainly written by Paul of Tarsus^[2] to a Christian church in the city of Philippi, province of Macedonia. This church had been founded by Paul himself in the early 50s of the first century (Acts 16). At the time of writing, in the late 50s or early 60s, Paul was in prison, and he had just received a monetary gift from the Philippians through their emissary, Epaphroditus.

These facts, though important, are few. Beyond them, there is wide disagreement among students of the epistle. Before we consider the areas of dispute, however, it may be helpful to summarize the viewpoint that serves, tentatively, as the basis for this commentary.

Reconstruction of Events

In AD 51 Paul, in obedience to a vision, made the momentous decision of leaving the Middle Eastern setting of Asia Minor. With Silas, Timothy, and Luke, he set sail for what we now call Europe. His first stop was the Roman colony of Philippi, a city of considerable importance in the ancient world.

[3] Meeting a group of faithful Jewish women, he proclaimed the Christian gospel, found a receptive audience, and established his first Christian congregation in Europe. (See Acts 16:1–15).

Young Timothy appears to have played a significant role in this work, and a natural bond was created between him and the Philippians. Among the first believers who struggled along with Paul in his ministry were several women—Lydia, Euodia, and Syntyche—along with an important figure named Clement, and other laborers. Paul’s experiences in that city were not all pleasant; they included conflict and imprisonment. Even his jailer was converted, however, and presumably joined the congregation (Acts 16:16–34; Phil. 2:19–22; 4:2–3).

Having been asked by the authorities to go away, Paul left Luke in charge of the congregation and headed west toward Thessalonica. During the three weeks of difficult ministry in this city, Paul several times received material assistance and thus spiritual encouragement from the believers in Philippi. Forced to flee, Paul went on to Berea, then to Athens, and finally to Corinth, where he stayed for a full eighteen months before returning to Antioch. During his prolonged stay in Corinth he again received assistance from the Philippian church (Acts 16:35–18:22; 2 Cor. 11:7–9; Phil. 4:15–16).

Eventually, perhaps a year later, Paul set out on another trip (the so-called third missionary journey), a major purpose of which was the raising of money from among his Gentile churches to meet the needs of the poor Jewish church in Jerusalem and Judea (Acts 18:23; Rom. 15:25–26; 1 Cor. 16:1–4; 2 Cor. 9:1–2, 12–23). There was a theological as well as a practical reason behind this effort. Paul’s emphasis on the gospel of grace entailed accepting Christian Gentiles without their being required to fulfill any Jewish ceremonies (cf. Gal. 5:2–6). This approach raised a few eyebrows in some Jewish circles, created serious tensions even among moderate groups, and provoked furious opposition elsewhere (cf. Acts 15:1–5; Gal. 2:1–16).

The Judaizers—as members of this last group are usually referred to—began a campaign of their own, designed to lead Paul’s converts to accept circumcision and the law as essential complements to their Christian confession (e.g., Gal. 1:6–9; 3:1–5; 5:7–10; 6:12–13). Because many perceived Paul’s missionary work to be an abandonment of his Jewish heritage, the apostle felt constrained to clarify his position. The bringing in of the Gentiles through faith apart from works was not a contradiction but a fulfillment of the Scriptures (e.g., Rom. 3:21, 29–31; 4:9–16). To show in a very concrete way that his work did not entail separation from the Jewish Christian church, Paul determined to raise a significant contribution motivated by love; after all, the Gentile churches owed at least this much to the Jews (Rom. 15:26–27).

As Paul traveled through Macedonia during his third journey (Acts 20:1–2), he would surely have warned the Philippians of the Judaizing threat (cf. below, the exegesis of Phil. 3:1), which had created havoc in Galatia and would no doubt spread to Philippi. Because the Philippians were in financial straits, and because they had already shown great generosity on several occasions, Paul was not intending to request that they contribute to this present project. As soon as they heard of it, however, they insisted on having a share; indeed, their poverty welled up in magnanimity (2 Cor. 8:1–5).

Paul completed his project and eventually brought the offering to Jerusalem (Acts 21:17–19; Rom. 15:25–32). Jewish opponents, however, managed to get him imprisoned, and for two years he awaited his fate in Caesarea (Acts 21:27–24:27). During this time the Philippians felt a responsibility to help Paul, but their own difficult circumstances, along with uncertainty about Paul’s status, prevented them from sending any assistance (Phil. 4:10). At last the apostle appealed to the emperor himself, and in the year 59 or 60, under guard, he sailed for Rome (Acts 25:10–12; 27:1). Word of this turn of events must have spread quickly through the Gentile churches, and the Philippians determined to have a share in Paul’s struggles as soon as they had the necessary information.

The apostle’s experience in Rome was mixed. He found opportunities to proclaim and defend the gospel among Jews, and his message spread through the praetorian guard and beyond; moreover, his boldness encouraged many Roman Christians to speak God's word (Acts 28:16–31; Phil. 1:12–14). But his imprisonment was also a time of affliction, filled with uncertainties, needs, and discouragement. Adding to his anguish was the presence of Jewish Christians who sympathized with many of the Judaizers' concerns. Rejecting the distinctive elements of Paul's preaching, these men were engaged in the proclamation of the gospel. Though they did not embrace the more objectionable elements of the Galatian heresy, their motivation was not pure; they aimed to undermine the work of the apostle for the sake of their own advancement (see the exegesis of Phil. 1:15–17).

Within a few months of Paul's arrival in Rome, the Philippians had become aware of his worsened situation. They therefore mounted their efforts and raised a large monetary gift (Phil. 4:18). The Philippians themselves, however, were undergoing some serious difficulties. Opponents of the Christian community were causing great alarm in the congregation, and the Judaizing threat was beginning to make itself felt (Phil. 1:27–30; 3:2, 18–19). Physical needs were producing anxiety among the members, who had begun to wonder whether their Christian faith was capable of sustaining them (Phil. 4:6, 19). All of those factors combined to create disagreements, distrust, and a poisonous spirit of self-seeking (Phil. 2:1–4). The leadership of the church, particularly in the persons of Euodia and Syntyche, had fallen into the sin of dissension, and the general health of the church had deteriorated considerably (Phil. 2:14–16; 4:2–3).

Conscious of how much they were in need of spiritual help and guidance, they dispatched Epaphroditus with the gift and asked Paul to keep him as his assistant but to send their beloved Timothy back to Philippi. On the way to Rome, Epaphroditus fell gravely ill and was unable to fulfill his mission speedily. A report of this setback reached Philippi, causing great consternation. Eventually, however, God spared Epaphroditus, who, at the risk of his life, continued on to Rome. By the time Epaphroditus reached Rome, Paul had been in prison perhaps for one year. The Philippians' offering therefore was truly a God-given blessing, and the apostle was at a loss how to express his thanks to a church that had given so sacrificially. The news of the problems in Philippi required immediate attention, but their request that Timothy be sent to them could not be granted. More and more people had deserted Paul, and Timothy alone could minister to him in this dark hour (Phil. 2:19–30).

Aware that the Philippians would be deeply disappointed to see Epaphroditus rather than Timothy return, Paul was faced with a serious challenge. How would he cushion this inevitable disappointment? Might Epaphroditus become the object of undeserved criticism? How could he convey his great joy for the church's continual participation in his apostolic ministry while at the same time rebuking them unambiguously for their grave lapse in sanctification? Would he be able to express his heartfelt thanks for their costly offering and yet discourage them from doing it again? And how would he report truthfully his own troubles without intensifying their spirit of discontent? How to help them in this great hour of their need!

The very difficulty of the task that was before the apostle would draw from him, under divine inspiration, a message full of comfort and joy, rebuke and encouragement, doctrine and exhortation. Quite beyond Paul's own powers of anticipation, the letter he was about to dictate would speak to the hearts of countless believers for many centuries to come.

For a discussion of the details in this reconstruction, the reader is referred to the relevant sections of the commentary. Two topics, however, require attention here: the provenance of the letter and the opponents faced by the apostle.

Provenance

The most controversial element in our summary is, no doubt, the place of writing. That Paul was in Rome when he wrote Philippians is the traditional view, but in modern times strong arguments have been set forth in favor of Caesarea and Ephesus (less commonly Corinth). This is a matter of some consequence for exegesis. A different geographical (and therefore chronological) setting will, for example, affect our identification of Paul's opponents, and hardly anything is more important to understand a polemical passage than to know what the writer is polemicizing against.

One important factor supporting the traditional view is precisely the fact that it is the only tradition that has survived. Whereas every other argument consists of inferences drawn from internal evidence, early tradition provides external attestation—presumably less ambiguous and therefore more “objective.” Most scholars would probably recognize, in principle, the wisdom of an old rule-of-thumb: go along with the external evidence if internal considerations are at least compatible with it. (To put it differently, we should not dismiss external attestation unless the internal evidence against it is very clear and persuasive.)

Unfortunately, the external evidence in favor of a Roman provenance is not all that strong. We cannot even be sure that it really qualifies as “external” evidence, because the earliest statements may themselves have been inferences drawn from the text of Philippians!^[4] Given these circumstances, it is not fair to demand that alternate theories be supported by conclusive arguments; internal considerations that merely tip the scales may be sufficient reason to adopt a different view.

A common argument against the traditional view stresses the geographical distance between Rome and Philippi. Since the epistle assumes that several communications have already taken place between Paul and the Philippians, many scholars argue that the evidence does not allow for all the time required to complete the necessary travels.^[5] If, on the other hand, Paul wrote this letter from Ephesus during the third missionary journey, the length of travel could be dramatically reduced. In my opinion, commentators have greatly overestimated the weight that can be placed on this argument. The reconstruction suggested above makes clear that only three communications are required:

1. The Philippians hear that Paul is imprisoned in Rome. (It may well be, however, that the Philippians became aware of the circumstances even before Paul actually reached Rome.)
2. Paul receives a gift through Epaphroditus.
3. The Philippians receive news that Epaphroditus has fallen ill. (However, if this incident took place during the journey, the distance involved would be reduced considerably.)^[6]

It is quite possible to fit those three journeys into a period of four to six months. But even if we allow a very generous two months for each of these journeys, far less than a year is necessary to account for them (and nothing in the data requires us to say that less than a year must have elapsed from Paul’s arrival in Rome to his writing of Philippians). It is very difficult to understand why this argument against a Roman origin continues to be taken seriously. The matter should be dropped from consideration. If we do so, however, then the only clear argument against the traditional view disappears. In other words, all other available internal evidence is at the very least compatible with a Roman imprisonment as the context for Philippians.

This conclusion affects how we evaluate alternate views. A competing theory, even though it may be plausible, can hardly be accepted simply on the grounds that the traditional position is deficient; rather, a persuasive positive case must be made for the new one. The case for an Ephesian origin rests on the relative geographical proximity of Ephesus to Philippi, but we have already suggested that the issue of distance is a pseudo-problem. The Ephesian theory, in any case, labors under two serious disadvantages: we have no positive evidence either for an imprisonment of Paul in Ephesus or for the presence of a praetorian guard in a senatorial province (see the second additional note on 1:13). To be sure, no one disputes the likelihood that Paul may have been imprisoned during his lengthy stay in that city; and the possibility that a praetorian guard could have been stationed in Ephesus must be left open. One must wonder, however, how much weight can be placed on a theory that builds possibility upon likelihood.[7]

Some other scholars—uncomfortable with both the Roman and the Ephesian theory—opt for a Caesarean origin. This theory cannot appeal to the long distance separating Rome from Philippi, since Caesarea is not any closer; it can, however, build on the unquestioned fact that Paul spent two years imprisoned in this Palestinian port city. Moreover, one can argue with some plausibility that the presence of an imperial palace in Caesarea accounts for Paul's reference to the praetorian guard. The question is then whether we can identify any positive evidence that would lead us to favor this theory over that of a Roman origin. No such evidence is forthcoming. The argument rests completely on the ability of some scholars to construct a Caesarean setting that makes sense out of the data in Philippians.[8] The line of reasoning is plausible and may be correct—it certainly cannot be disproved. But it cannot be said to hold a higher status of credibility than the Roman theory.

In short, a Roman setting fits the data at least as well as competing views, and it has the added (though admittedly weak) advantage of being supported by some early tradition. Since alternative theories are based on plausible, but not compelling, arguments, we are left without a reason to abandon the traditional view. I shall, therefore, in this commentary assume a Roman origin for Philippians and allow it to serve us as a tentative framework for the discussion of exegetical problems, such as the identification of Paul's opponents. On the other hand, it remains little more than a theory, and any exegetical conclusions that lean heavily on it must be regarded as methodologically weak or even invalid.

Paul's Opponents

Apart from the question of the place of origin, other debatable issues regarding the historical context of Philippians are best treated as they come up in the text itself, since the exegesis of the text is our primary tool for resolving such problems. Only one additional question requires preliminary discussion at this point, and that is the identification of the opponents to whom Paul alludes in the letter. The relevant passages are 1:15–17; 1:27–28; 3:2; and 3:18–19 (though we also detect hints of this problem in 2:14–16 and 3:12–16).

It would be possible to see a distinct group of opponents in each of those four passages. Only the first one refers specifically to individuals with whom Paul himself was having to deal while he was in prison: they were “brethren” who preached the gospel with the impure motive of harming the apostle. The warning in 1:27–28 could reflect opposition from Gentiles. The reference in 3:2 is clearly to legalists, whether we regard them as unbelieving Jews or as Christian Judaizers. Finally, the “enemies of the cross” described in 3:18–19 sound like morally loose teachers (libertines or, more specifically, antinomians).

Such a wide diversity of references is unlikely, and most scholars detect no more than two or three distinct groups. The present commentary is rather unusual (though hardly unique) in arguing that all of the passages in question refer to groups that shared some fundamental concerns. Although it is obvious that Paul's attitude as he writes 1:15–17 is quite different from that which he reflects in 3:2, and that therefore the two groups must certainly be distinguished in some way, there is much to be said for the view that both groups objected to Paul on the same or very similar grounds. My thesis is

- that 3:2 describes Judaizers such as are explicitly opposed in Galatians;

- that just as the Judaizing heresy, strange as it may sound, led to antinomianism and perfectionism in Galatia (cf. Gal. 5:13–21; 6:1?), so it may have happened in Philippi;^[9]
- that such a front of opposition may account for the words in 1:28–29 and so there is no need to postulate yet another group (though nothing prevents us from thinking that the Philippian believers did suffer persecution from Gentiles);
- that the conduct of the “brethren” described in 1:15–17 cannot be accounted for satisfactorily unless they had some disagreements of substance with the apostle, and our knowledge of conflicts in the early church suggests strongly that they may have objected to some of the distinctive features of Paul’s preaching to the Gentiles.

Scholars rarely point out that among Jewish Christians in the early church one surely could have found the whole range of possible responses to Paul’s preaching—from full sympathy to minor reservations, then on to explicit opposition and even vicious hostility. The reservations, whether minor or major, would have focused on where the line was to be drawn regarding the status of, and requirements for, Gentile Christians. The desire to draw that line tightly would often, but not always, reflect theological opposition to the gospel of grace. It is not difficult to imagine how, in any early Christian community, unworthy and jealous leaders might have capitalized on these conflicts. Without necessarily preaching a message of works righteousness, they may have simply hoped to advance their own cause at the expense of Paul’s reputation.

A Roman setting is naturally compatible with this description. The Epistle to the Romans makes clear that Christians in Rome were aware of and concerned about the Judaizers’ attacks on the integrity of Paul’s gospel. Some of those believers may indeed have been disposed to raise the very objections that Paul addresses in Romans (e.g., 3:1, 5; 6:1, 15; 9:6, 19). On the other hand, we have no evidence that the full-blown Judaizing heresy had yet manifested itself in the capital of the empire; Paul therefore, as he described his opponents in Rome (Phil. 1:15–17), would have seen no need to utter the anathema of Gal. 1:8–9.

On the other hand, an extreme form of Jewish Christianity was very likely making its presence felt in Macedonia by the late 50s. Most commentators, quite rightly in my opinion, see this heresy reflected in Phil.

3:2. What is not so clear is whether the same or a very different kind of opposition forms the background for the second part of that chapter. The evidence is ambiguous, and I refer the reader to the exegesis of 3:12 and 3:17–19 for the details. While a definitive conclusion is not within our reach, I shall argue that chapter 3 of Philippians is a coherent passage and that there are no insuperable objections to identifying “the enemies of the cross” (3:18) as heterodox Jewish Christians or their disciples.^[10]

Literary Context

In the broadest sense, the literary context of Philippians consists of the whole range of ancient literature that is part of Paul’s cultural milieu. Different scholars, depending on their interests and expertise, may legitimately appeal to a wide variety of parallels in expounding this epistle. Naturally, those writings closest to the thought of the apostle (contemporary Christian documents, that is, the NT) are bound to be particularly helpful. Our primary source, however, is the Pauline corpus itself. And while one runs the danger of blunting the distinctiveness of Philippians by appealing to the rest of the epistles, it would be a grave mistake to treat this letter in isolation from the rest. Accordingly, the present commentary makes abundant use of parallels in the Pauline writings to interpret the Philippians text.

In the present section, of course, we cannot attempt to summarize the Pauline corpus. Our purpose here is rather to look at the text of Philippians as a whole with a view to identifying patterns and distinctive emphases in the letter. I am, therefore, using the term literary to include not only the narrower concerns of literary criticism but also linguistic traits, argumentation, and even the distinctive theological teaching of Philippians.

Language and Style

The easiest, but also the most superficial, method of profiling the linguistic character of a writing is by presenting statistics based on the writer’s vocabulary. We can very quickly, for example, count those words that are unique to Philippians (my statistics come from Aland 1978–83). The total comes to forty different words, a proportionately higher number than average: Galatians and Ephesians, which are longer, contain thirty-one and thirty-five, respectively. Four of these hapax legomena, however, are proper names (Euodia, Clement, Syntyche, Philippians), and many others are derivatives of otherwise common terms.[11]

We learn a little more about the lexical distinctiveness of Philippians, however, by noticing certain terms, not uncommon in themselves, that appear with disproportionate frequency in this letter. The term δέσμιος (desmios, prisoner) occurs four times in Philippians; otherwise in Paul only once in Colossians and once in 2 Timothy. The verb ἡγέομαι (hēgeomai, regard, consider) occurs six times; otherwise only once in 2 Corinthians, 1 Thessalonians, 2 Thessalonians, twice in 1 Timothy. Very noticeable is the frequency of “joy” terminology, namely, the verb χαίρω (chairō) and the noun χαρά (chara): these terms occur fourteen times (3.5 times per chapter) in Philippians, while the total for the rest of Paul’s letters is thirty-six times (less than 0.5 times per chapter). Most significant of all are the ten occurrences of φρονέω (phroneō, think), otherwise used only thirteen times in Paul, nine times in Romans; this striking characteristic will come up for discussion below under “Distinctive Teaching.”

One question that arises generally in the Pauline corpus, but pointedly in Philippians, is whether the apostle intends clear semantic distinctions when similar terms are grouped together.[12] Many commentators, persuaded that Paul could not be guilty of redundancy, look for these distinctions and emphasize them. It is unfortunate, however, that the term redundancy continues to be viewed in a purely negative light. Linguists, drawing on the work of communication engineers, have long recognized that redundancy is a built-in feature of every language and that it aids, rather than hinders, the process of communication.

Though Paul is certainly not thoughtless in his choice of vocabulary, this commentary will argue that lexical distinctions are often neutralized in specific contexts and that many variations result from a need for stylistic reinforcement rather than from a desire to make an additional substantive point. Even some of the controversial terms in the Christ-hymn, I believe, are better understood if we resist sharp distinctions among them (see comments on 2:6–8). What is true of individual lexical items may also be reflected in longer linguistic units, such as the emotive phrases in 2:1, which Lightfoot (1868: 67) perceptively described as a “tautology of earnestness.”

Syntactical questions too must be treated in accordance with the common functions of natural languages. The assumption that Paul’s syntax must always be rigorously logical contradicts this principle, and it comes to grief at a few points in this letter (see additional notes on 1:27). Grammatical irregularities are exceptional, however, and we dare not use them to justify a sloppy approach to the text.

One specific syntactical question that requires comment is that of tense (or better, aspectual) distinctions. The viewpoint adopted in this commentary is that the significance of such distinctions for biblical interpretation has been greatly overestimated by most commentators, particularly conservative writers. Aspectual choices are usually restricted by factors of a grammatical or contextual nature, and so only seldom do they reflect a conscious semantic motivation (so probably 3:7–8, though even this passage is controverted). In short, no reasonable Greek author, when wishing to make a substantive point, is likely to have depended on his readers' ability to interpret subtle syntactical distinctions.^[13] Decisions regarding the use of verbal aspect in Philippians sometimes involve textual variants (as in 1:9), but they also come up elsewhere (e.g., see additional note on 1:21).

The description of an author's style cannot be limited to the level of words and sentences, and in recent decades linguists have given increasing attention to the paragraph as a basic unit of language. This new approach, usually referred to as discourse analysis, has led to a renewed concern for the textual coherence of biblical writings. Such a concern, however, overlaps with the task of identifying the structure of a writer's argument (see "Literary Structure" below). In the case of Philippians, that task is complicated by challenges to the literary unity of the letter, a question to which we must first turn our attention.

Literary Integrity

Our discussion of the historical context of Philippians assumed that the letter is an integral whole and that therefore our reconstructed occasion applies to it in its totality. Many important commentators, however, believe that the tone of chapter 3 is incompatible with the rest of the epistle; this section (including perhaps the opening verses of ch. 4) is widely regarded as a separate letter written to the Philippians specifically to combat the heretical forces they were facing. Some of those scholars also find it difficult to believe that Paul would wait till the end of his letter (4:10–20) to thank the Philippians for their gift; thus it is thought that this passage represents yet a third missive (chronologically the first?) occasioned simply by the arrival of that offering.

In spite of its relative popularity,[14] this literary reconstruction labors under enormous difficulties. In the first place, no external textual evidence can be adduced in its favor. The textual attestation for Philippians is rich and early. One document, P⁴⁶, brings us to the early third or even late second century, yet neither this nor any other manuscript, to say nothing of early patristic allusions, gives any indication that the letter ever circulated in a different form from that which we have.[15] One can argue, of course, that someone simply brought these three letters together prior to their being circulated. Anything is possible. But we must ask whether it is likely that absolutely no trace of such a process would have been preserved.

In the second place, proponents of this view need to provide a motive that would have led to such a literary process. Here again we cannot be satisfied with speculating what possibly may have led someone to edit three separate letters of Paul into one. If we are expected to accept a literary reconstruction for which no external evidence exists, we may rightfully ask for a demonstration of probability. For example, do we know (say, from statements by the church fathers) that any early Christian attempted to merge separate apostolic writings into one, or even that anyone thought such an attempt would be useful?

In the third place, the theory is unable to account for the alleged redactor's method of working. The strongest evidence for the theory is the abruptness of 3:1–2, but this is a two-edged sword: What would lead an editor to incorporate a separate document at such an awkward point? Again, why would a redactor append the note of thanks at the end, where it seems to be out of place? Editorial revisions are normally undertaken with a view to attenuating, not aggravating, literary problems and inconsistencies. (See also the introduction to §IV.)

Supporting the literary integrity of the letter are some interesting features, such as the striking verbal parallels between chapter 3 and earlier sections (cf. esp. 2:6–11 with 3:7–11). Particularly significant is the coherence achieved by beginning and ending the main body of the epistle with similar phraseology (see comments at 1:27–28 and 3:20–4:1). These and many other traits have caught the attention of recent scholars interested in discourse analysis and rhetorical criticism, disciplines that focus on the question of literary consistency.

The most important contribution in this field is a very fine article by Garland (1985) that has, in my opinion, changed the complexion of the contemporary discussion.^[16] Though various aspects of his literary interpretation are debatable, he has clearly demonstrated, by the use of internal evidence, that the unity of the letter is on a sure footing and, more important, that such evidence is incompatible with any view of literary fragmentation. Further details are best discussed at the relevant points in the commentary itself. What needs to be stressed here is that the only kind of evidence brought forth against the unity of Philippians is now being proved to be not merely ambiguous—which would be sufficient reason to reject the theory in the absence of other evidence—but rather clearly supportive of the opposite viewpoint.

At any rate, the letter deserves to be understood in the only form in which it has come down to us. This principle affects not only the question of literary unity but also the way we approach 2:6–11 and 3:20–21, which are often thought to reflect Paul's use of preexisting materials. As will be argued in the exegesis of those two passages, the primary responsibility of a commentator is to make sense of the text in the context in which it is found, not on the basis of a setting that is no longer extant.

Literary Structure

The arguments that support the unity of Philippians also provide a basis for understanding its structure. Admittedly, the epistle is not easy to outline, and commentators have failed to reach a consensus. It is essential, however, to trace the flow of the argument as carefully as possible. Exegesis depends heavily on contextual information, since the meaning of a particular proposition is largely determined by its place in the larger argument: What has led to this proposition? How does it advance the argument? What does it lead to? An outline, therefore, should be no mere table of contents, but an interpretive summary of the document. And while the effort should be made to approximate the original author's conception (assuming he had self-consciously constructed an outline), the success of an outline is to be gauged primarily by whether or not it communicates clearly the interpreter's understanding of the letter.

Certain portions of Philippians can be clearly identified as discrete sections. For example, no one doubts that the first two verses constitute the salutation and that verses 3–11 conform to the Pauline pattern of opening a letter with a thanksgiving. There is also wide agreement that the section that begins at 1:12 concludes at 1:26, a view supported by the likelihood that Paul uses the rhetorical technique of inclusio (or inclusion), that is, the bracketing of the passage by beginning and ending it with the same term, in this case προκοπή (prokopē, progress [found nowhere else in the NT]). Other clear units are 2:5–11; 2:19–30; 3:1–4:1 (though here the precise beginning and end are disputed); and 4:10–20. But are we able to relate these units to one another as parts of larger sections?

To begin with, we could point out that the body of the letter (as distinct from its opening and closing) extends from 1:12 to 4:20. More interesting and significant is the possibility of inclusio bracketing the section from 1:27 to 4:3.^[17] If so, that material could be viewed as the true body of the letter, in which the Philippians are exhorted to stand and struggle together as they exercise their Christian citizenship. While there is no doubt some validity in this approach, a different analysis is needed if we wish to bring out the diversity of material in that large section.

One important clue is the distinctive character of 1:12–26. This passage is unusual in that Paul does not normally give details about his personal circumstances at this early point in the letter (the closest parallel is 2 Cor. 1:8–11, 15–17; cf. Rom. 1:13–15). I shall argue in the commentary that the peculiar relationship between Paul and the Philippians, and in particular their support of his missionary work, made it appropriate for the apostle to give an account of his present conditions at the very beginning of the letter. The section ends with a vague allusion to his plans, a topic that he takes up again and develops in 2:19–30. A useful outline should in some way indicate the connection between these two passages.

Now while a new section begins at 1:27, commentators are unable to agree beyond that point. Since 1:30 seems to mark the end of a paragraph, should we begin a completely new section with 2:1? Or does the new section begin with verse 5? Or verse 12? Or verse 19? One of the most important structural points made in this commentary is that all of that material, from 1:27 to 2:18, belongs together and constitutes the heart of the epistle. It would be a mistake, however, to draw too sharp a line between this section and the one that follows. Indeed, 2:19–30 fulfills a double purpose: it resumes the report of 1:12–26, but it also, more subtly, reinforces the exhortations of 1:27–2:8 by setting up Timothy and Epaphroditus as examples to be followed. I have therefore treated 1:27–2:30 as a self-contained major section while making clear that its last subsection (2:19–30) has a different character from what precedes it.

As for chapter 3, we must leave open the possibility that Paul had not intended, initially, to deal with the matters covered there—after all, it would have meant repeating instructions that the Philippians were familiar with (see introduction to §IV). The seriousness of the Judaizing threat, however, suggested that he should take nothing for granted, and so he decided to extend the letter. This is a possible, though admittedly speculative, explanation for the abruptness of the passage. At any rate, 3:1 (or possibly 3:2) begins a wholly new section that ends at 4:1 (possibly 4:3). With 4:2 the concluding exhortations begin. Then at verse 10, for reasons discussed fully in the commentary, Paul finally gets around to thanking the Philippians for the offering they sent with Epaphroditus.

The resulting outline, on the basis of which the chapters of the commentary have been divided, is as follows:

I. Opening (1:1–11)

A. Salutation (1:1–2)

B. Thanksgiving (1:3–8)

1. Initial statement (1:3–5)

2. Expansion (1:6–8)

C. Prayer (1:9–11)

II. Paul's missionary report (1:12–26)

A. Paul's circumstances (1:12–17)

1. The unfettered progress of the gospel (1:12–14)

2. Blessing mixed with adversity (1:15–17)

B. Paul's attitude (1:18–26)

1. Joy in salvation (1:18–20)

2. Death no threat (1:21–24)

3. A word of reassurance (1:25–26)

III. A call to sanctification (1:27–2:30)

A. Christian citizenship (1:27–2:4)

1. Tenacity (1:27–28)
2. Suffering (1:29–30)
3. Unity (2:1–4)
- B. Christian humility (2:5–11)
 1. Paul’s exhortation (2:5)
 2. Christ’s humiliation (2:6–8)
 3. Christ’s exaltation (2:9–11)
- C. Christian obedience (2:12–18)
 1. The believer’s work (2:12–13)
 2. Blameless children (2:14–16)
 3. A personal appeal (2:17–18)
- D. Resumption of Paul’s missionary report (2:19–30)
 1. Timothy (2:19–24)
 2. Epaphroditus (2:25–30)

IV. Doctrinal polemics (3:1–4:1)

- A. Judaizers as the context for theology (3:1–6)
 1. Paul on the offensive (3:1–3)
 2. Mock boasting (3:4–6)
- B. The essence of Pauline theology (3:7–11)
 1. Spiritual bankruptcy (3:7–8)
 2. Spiritual wealth (3:9–11)
- C. Practical theology (3:12–4:1)
 1. Frustration and hope (3:12–14)
 2. Growth through obedience (3:15–16)
 3. Patterns of behavior (3:17–19)
 4. Heavenly citizenship (3:20–4:1)

V. Final concerns (4:2–23)

- A. Exhortations (4:2–9)
 1. Final call for unity (4:2–3)
 2. Joy and anxiety (4:4–7)
 3. Obedience and peace (4:8–9)
- B. A word of thanks (4:10–20)
 1. Need and contentment (4:10–14)

2. A theology of Christian giving (4:15–20)

C. Closing (4:21–23)

Addendum. The years since the first edition of this commentary have seen a remarkable spate of articles and monographs dealing with the literary structure of Philippians. The tools used for this purpose include discourse analysis (or text linguistics), rhetorical criticism (the classical art of persuasion), and epistolary analysis (the genre and form of ancient letters). [18]

1. The most detailed and impressive application of discourse analysis to Philippians is by Jeffrey T. Reed (1997). Although I have elsewhere expressed reservations about the value of this discipline as usually practiced (see Silva 1995; cf. also Bockmuehl 1998: 23–24), it can hardly be doubted that Reed’s careful attention to matters of structure and “texture” shed light both on the character of the letter and on Paul’s method of argumentation. A more narrowly conceived approach—and for that very reason useful—is the analysis of transitional markers by Jonas Holmstrand (1997). Note also the essays by G. H. Guthrie, S. H. Levinsohn, S. E. Porter, and J. T. Reed brought together in Porter and Carson (1995).

2. A tour de force in rhetorical criticism is a monograph by Peter Wick (1994) in which the author points out that there are striking parallels and similarities between five pairs of passages in Philippians: A = 1:12–26 and 3:1–16; B = 1:27–30 and 3:17–21; C = 2:1–11 and 4:1–3; D = 2:12–18 and 4:4–9; E = 2:19–30 and 4:10–20. Wick further detects broad structural links among these five double sections, with the Christ-hymn at the center of the schema, and attempts to show how this structure relates to the contents of the letter. The author argues that Philippians is a work of high literary quality that was possible both because Paul had a relaxed and friendly relationship with the Philippian Christians and because during his home-imprisonment in Rome he had the rest and time necessary to concentrate (Wick 1994: 11, 187, 191).

My summary of Wick’s theory does not begin to do justice to its complexity. It is difficult to read this work carefully without being impressed by the force of the evidence. By the same token, it is just as difficult to believe that Paul would have expended such extraordinary effort in constructing an edifice that, as far as we can tell, nobody noticed until the end of the twentieth century. Even if one is unpersuaded by Wick’s proposal, however, there is no denying that many, indeed, probably the majority, of the rhetorical features he has uncovered are really there in the text. Stylistic arguments against the unity of the letter thus appear less and less plausible.

Not as complex, but also careful and instructive, is the use of “oral biblical criticism” by C. W. Davis (1999). The author argues for a concentric structure in Philippians, according to which the beginning and concluding sections (1:3–26 and 4:10–20) provide examples of Christian unity, while the two inner sections (1:27–2:18 and 3:1–4:9) consist of commands; the central section (2:19–30) provides an exemplification of the theme of unity by describing Timothy and Epaphroditus. (In an appendix, Davis includes a helpful list that details instances of synonymy in Philippians.)

In a monograph that ostensibly focuses on the Christ-hymn (arguing that it is not poetic but rather epideictic prose composed by Paul), Ralph Brucker (1997) in fact discusses the rhetorical features of Philippians as a whole. The author gives an analysis of various ancient writings that provide examples of epideictic literature—documents that are laudatory in character but that sometimes include rebuke (Brucker 1997: 278). Philippians may be viewed against such a background. Brucker (1997: 286–90) gives detailed evidence of keyword combinations in the letter that are not compatible with theories of partition.

Most of these works (as well as others mentioned elsewhere in this introduction) include proposed outlines based on ancient epistolography and rhetorical textbooks. For example, Watson (1988) sees Philippians as consisting of exordium (introduction, 1:3–26), narratio (narrative, 1:27–30), probatio (demonstration, 2:1–3:21), and peroratio (closing, 4:1–20). Witherington (1994) limits the exordium to 1:3–11, identifies the narratio as 1:12–26, and regards 1:27–30 as the propositio that introduces the demonstration. Black (1995) uses the term argumentatio for 1:27 to 3:1, which he subdivides into propositio (1:27–30), probatio (2:1–30), and refutatio (3:1–21); he further identifies the peroratio as 4:1–9, with an additional narratio at 4:10–20. A number of other variations are possible (cf. Williams 2002: 88–90). It is debatable whether the use of these technical terms sheds genuine light on what Paul was intending to do or whether it imposes an artificial scheme on the text (cf. Silva 2001: 92–95). Nevertheless, it is helpful to have competing outlines, none of which can lay claim to being exclusively right. Alternate ways of structuring the material can provide new insights into the flow of the argument and the connections between its parts. (Less persuasive are attempts to view the whole letter as a large chiasm; cf. Luter and Lee 1995 and the rebuttal by Porter and Reed 1998.)

3. Efforts to identify the specific genre of Philippians within the context of ancient letters (a primary concern of epistolary analysis) have proven ambiguous. As already noted, a detailed analysis of rhetorical features has led at least one scholar (Brucker 1997) to view this letter against the background of epideictic literature. More influential has been an important study by Loveday Alexander (1989) showing that Philippians shares a number of formal patterns with ancient family letters. This evidence has given new impetus to the view that the basic Greco-Roman “letter of friendship” provides the most appropriate category within which to understand Philippians.

Ben Witherington, for example, has written a whole monograph on Friendship and Finances in Philippi (1994). Gordon Fee’s (1995: 12) commentary identifies Philippians as a Christian hortatory letter of friendship and uses that concept especially in the exposition of chapter 4 (it may be noteworthy, however, that outside of this chapter Fee hardly ever refers to it). An anthology on the subject of ancient friendship (Fitzgerald 1996) includes four essays on Philippians (by John Reumann, Ken L. Berry, Abraham J. Marlierbe, and John T. Fitzgerald). Among periodical articles that make use of the theme, note the study of Phil. 1:21–26 by J. L. Jaquette (1994), of 2:6–11 by M. I. Wegener (1998), and of 2:25–30 by R. Metzner (2002).

A general question that plagues any such attempts to identify the precise (sub)genre of Philippians (or any other Pauline letter) is whether Paul was consciously following a literary model. Even if he was not, of course, there is something to be gained by recognizing his use of (or, more important, his deviations from) conventional letter-writing traditions. Nevertheless, how we interpret those correspondences does depend significantly on whether or not the apostle was making deliberate choices (and whether or not the readers may have been expected to perceive them). Unfortunately, modern expositors seldom address that issue directly.

In addition, we are faced by the more specific problem that nowhere in Philippians does Paul make explicit reference (or unambiguous allusion) to the Greco-Roman concept of friendship and that the main body of the letter (from 1:12 to the end of ch. 3) provides very little evidence, if any, in support of this view. Indeed, if the letter had not included the material in chapter 4 (and especially vv. 10–20), it seems unlikely that anyone would have thought of calling Philippians a letter of friendship. “Philippians certainly manifests many informal aspects of a warm human friendship. . . . That recognition alone, however, does not suffice to confirm the requisite social and epistolary conventions of Graeco-Roman philia” (Bockmuehl 1998: 35).

Perhaps more productive might be the approach followed by Paul Holloway (2001) in an unusually interesting monograph on the subject of consolation. The author argues that Philippians should be viewed in the light of ancient consolers, who “understood their primary task to be not one of sharing in the grief of others, but one of removing that grief by rational argument and frank exhortation” (Holloway 2001: 1). Although at first Holloway seems to identify Philippians formally as an “epistle of consolation,” his focus is properly on function and content: Paul writes primarily to console the Philippians, and the letter can thus be compared helpfully with other documents written for similar purposes (Holloway 2001: 2). From this perspective, Holloway provides valuable insights throughout the monograph, such as the suggestion that the Philippians’ basic problem was one of discouragement (Holloway 2001: 47; note also his original handling of 1:22–26 and 2:25–30 on pp. 53–54).

Distinctive Teaching

Considerations of a document’s literary context cannot be limited to formal questions such as style and structure. While these are not merely preliminaries to “the real thing” (they are very much part of the whole substance), our primary interest is of course the content communicated through them. The discussion of structure has already, and necessarily, touched on the content of Philippians, but we need to identify more directly the letter’s teaching (the whole), against which we can more accurately interpret its individual propositions (the parts). Inevitably, the discussion becomes a theological exercise.

Now in our attempt to interpret a biblical book, hardly any issue is more important than that of its distinctiveness. For believers who take seriously the divine inspiration—and therefore the unity—of Scripture, biblical study should focus very sharply on this basic question: Why did God see fit to include this or that document in the NT canon? Let us consider then what it is that Philippians contributes to our understanding of the gospel. What is its specific “canonical function”?

Two factors, unfortunately, have hindered students in this endeavor. In the first place, the strong emphasis of the epistle on the subject of rejoicing, along with the obvious affection that united the apostle with the Philippian church, has led many readers to think of that church as a model congregation with relatively few and minor problems. This feature also lends a very practical and personal tone to the letter, so that we tend to downplay its doctrinal content. The influential commentator J. B. Lightfoot, in fact, argued that it was precisely that feature that distinguishes Philippians from the theologically charged letter of Paul to the Galatians. [19]

The second factor pulls in quite a different direction. I refer here to the Carmen Christi (2:6–11). While no one is likely to deny the very great importance of this passage, perhaps we need to ask if excessive attention has been paid to it at the expense of obscuring some other important features of the letter. This matter has been complicated, of course, by the tendency in contemporary scholarship to focus primarily on the (pre-Pauline) origins of this hymn, with the result that the passage has been isolated from its literary context. In any case, many of us have been conditioned to think of Christology as the primary teaching of Philippians, even though this doctrine is quite secondary to Paul’s main concern.

As the outline delineated above makes clear, 2:6–11 is but one paragraph in a larger section that may be considered the heart of the epistle. The pervasive theme in this section is Christian sanctification, as reflected in the commands to behave in a manner worthy of the gospel (1:27), to obey (2:12), to become blameless (2:15). More specifically, Paul focuses on the need for Christian unity, which in turn calls for selflessness and humility (1:27; 2:1–4). Right in the middle of this discussion Paul appeals to the selfless act of Jesus Christ, who made himself nothing, but who was then exalted by the Father. And so the point of the Carmen Christi is not primarily to make a statement regarding the nature of Christ’s person (ontology), but to impress on the Philippians the pattern to which they must be conformed.

Now the Christian's duty to grow in holiness requires the right attitude, singleness of purpose, and mental concentration. Paul's concern with this matter is reflected in the striking frequency of the verb φρονέω (phroneō, lit. "think") in Philippians. This peculiarity has often been mentioned by commentators but seldom developed (see, however, the important monograph by Heriban 1983). Moreover, the English reader can easily miss it because the verb, which can be used in a variety of contexts, requires more than one rendering.

As early as 1:7, for example, Paul sets the tone by telling the Philippians that he, as their model (cf. 3:17; 4:9), "thinks rightly" about them, that is, has the proper frame of mind or attitude toward them. The verb is used twice in 2:2 (also in 4:2) to stress the unity of mind that should characterize the congregation, and then again in verse 5 to exhort them to imitate Jesus's own attitude. In chapter 3, proper thinking (v. 15, two times) is set against the earthly thinking of the enemies of the cross (v. 19). In 4:10, finally, Paul uses the verb twice to encourage the Philippians by acknowledging that they already have shown a commendable attitude.

That these facts are significant is further impressed on the reader by other comparable terminology, such as ἡγέομαι (hēgeomai, consider, regard; which appears in the important contexts of 2:3, 6 and 3:8), σκοπέω (skopeō, notice, consider; 2:4; 3:17), and λογίζομαι (logizomai, reckon, consider; 3:13; 4:8). Moreover, we find in Philippians an abundance of "knowledge" terminology, especially in 1:9–11 and 3:8–10. All of these references include, but are not restricted to, purely intellectual concerns. The main point is expressed by Paul elsewhere with military and athletic imagery (1:27, 30; 3:12–14; 4:1, 3). The focus on the mind, therefore, has much to do with mental determination.

As suggested in the discussion of the letter's historical context, the Philippians were facing great adversity, had lost their sense of Christian joy, and were tempted to abandon their struggle.^[20] Accordingly, this letter places great weight on the need to stand fast and persevere. It is remarkable that this note of perseverance has not played a more significant role in the interpretation of Philippians. Most readers tend to view the Philippian church in the best possible light, but the text makes clear that these believers were experiencing severe spiritual problems. Many of them, apparently, had lost confidence in their ability to maintain their Christian confession. Paul encourages them to stand fast and contend (1:27–28; 4:1), to run their race without looking back (3:13–15), to take seriously their awesome responsibility of working out their salvation (2:12).

Such an emphasis on spiritual effort may appear to minimize the doctrine of grace. Remarkably, it is in Philippians more than in any other letter that Paul stresses our complete dependence on God for sanctification. That note is sounded triumphantly as early as 1:6 and is applied forcefully in 2:13, but it is also reflected throughout the letter (see comments on 1:19–20; 3:12; 4:13, 19). The twin truths of human responsibility and divine sovereignty thus turn out to provide the theological underpinnings for the teaching of Philippians.[\[21\]](#)

Transmission

Though we normally use the term context in reference only to the original setting of an author and of the immediate readers, responsible exegetes understand that we have no direct access to that setting. The documents we study have acquired, so to speak, many new settings in the course of history, including our own contemporary context.[\[22\]](#) Consciously or not, we all read Philippians through the spectacles provided by that history. Only by paying some attention to the transmission of the letter can we determine to what extent those spectacles have clarified or distorted the text.

Textual History

Understandably, the study of textual criticism focuses on the original form of a document.[\[23\]](#) The student must remember, however, that textual variants are not to be regarded as isolated options contemporary with the document. On the contrary, their proper evaluation depends on our ability to understand their place in the historical transmission of the text.[\[24\]](#) Moreover, that transmission has its own independent value, even when it does not aid us in establishing the original form. Textual changes often reflect patterns of interpretation; textual history thus flows over into exegetical history.

From the point of view of an exegetical commentary, the need for a coherent summary of textual transmission becomes especially pressing. The additional notes sections in this volume comment on some forty variants.[\[25\]](#) Unfortunately, the treatment of textual problems as they come up in the text means that the variants tend to be treated in isolation from each other. The user of this commentary will be in a much better position to assess individual variants if we can summarize the nature of the variations as a whole.

The most accessible source for this purpose is NA²⁷, which lists many more variants than UBS⁴. Even this larger number, of course, represents only a portion of the available evidence; the editor, Kurt Aland, has had to do a great deal of preliminary sifting of the material to produce this handy text, and those students who depend on it are in effect trusting the editor's judgment for a very large number of decisions. In my opinion, Aland's principles and procedure are generally valid and well executed. The resulting work is a magnificent edition that can serve us well as a starting point.

If we exclude four conjectures (1:7; 2:1, 6, 16) and two interpretive problems (1:25 and 4:3; συνεπισκόποις in 1:1 probably belongs here as well), we come up with approximately 112 variations.^[26] The categories of omissions, additions, and grammatical alterations are fairly evenly divided and together constitute more than 70 of the variations. Almost 20 of the variants are simple changes of one word for another (such as θεός for κύριος, δέ for καί, etc.) and 6 or 7 are transpositions, leaving another dozen or so that are not easily classified. A list of the passages, with more detailed categories, will prove helpful (question marks alert the reader to passages that could be placed in more than one category):

Omissions

article—1:5, 17; 2:9; 3:10 (two times), 14

preposition—1:7, 23, 24; 3:11; 4:16

conjunction—1:18?, 23; 2:4, 12?; 3:7, 8, 12; 4:15

other (may include art./prep./conj.)—1:30; 2:4, 30; 3:3, 12; 4:1

Additions

article—1:10; 2:3, 13, 30; 3:1, 8

preposition—none

conjunction—1:4, 28; 2:5; 4:18

other—1:3, 8, 15?; 2:24, 26; 3:6, 8, 12, 16, 18, 21; 4:1, 3?, 13, 23

Grammatical changes

case etc.—1:8, 11, 28; 2:1 (three times), 4 (two times), 7, 27; 3:3, 6, 11; 4:10, 16

verbal endings—1:9, 22, 24, 27; 2:4, 5, 11, 14?, 15, 16; 4:19 Word substitutions divine name—1:3; 2:19, 30; 3:14?; 4:7 (two times) prep./conj.—1:18, 19, 22?; 3:13, 14 other—1:17; 2:2, 15 (two times), 30?; 4:7
 Transpositions—1:6, 16–17, 28; 2:21, 26; 3:7; 4:3?
 Miscellaneous—1:11, 20, 23, 25; 2:3 (two times); 3:14 (two times), 21;
 4:21

Ideally, this summary of information should include the whole Pauline corpus and be more rigorously classified. Even in this limited form, however, the data can be of considerable help. Decisions on individual variants should be preceded by an examination of other variants in the same category. A reading that appears strong when evaluated in isolation may prove suspect once we discover it reflects a certain pattern of scribal activity (e.g., see the second additional note on 3:10, on the omission of the articles).

An additional consideration is that, generally speaking, individual manuscripts tend to align themselves according to certain text-types.^[27] As is well known, the reconstructed text that appears in both NA²⁷ and UBS⁴ corresponds very closely to the Alexandrian text-type found in such important witnesses as \mathfrak{P}^{46} and codices Vaticanus, Sinaiticus, and Alexandrinus. When all or most of these manuscripts agree on a reading, NA²⁷ rejects it very rarely (cf. however the addition of ἰδεῖν at 2:26 and the bracketing of the articles at 3:10). How do the other text-types differ from this one?

The “Western” text,^[28] represented primarily by the Greek codices D, F, and G (and sometimes supported by witnesses to a different text-type), contains approximately:

nine omissions—1:5, 7, 17, 23; 2:4 (two times), 9; 3:12 (two times) seven additions—1:3, 4, 14; 2:5; 3:6, 12, 16 nine word substitutions—1:11, 20, 23; 2:3?, 15 (two times), 19; 3:14; 4:7

Other kinds of variants are found at 1:8, 11 (μοι in F and G); 2:11; 4:10, 19. Not all of those, however, should be regarded as distinctively “Western” readings (on the other hand, NA²⁷ does not include all of the variants that may be so regarded). Worthy of note is the large proportion of variants that involve a change in the divine names (1:3, 11, 14; 2:19; 3:6, 12, 14).

The Byzantine (or Majority) text is the form found in the majority of surviving Greek manuscripts, which were produced in the Middle Ages. Distinctively Byzantine readings can sometimes be found in very ancient witnesses and may certainly be original (though the combination or pattern of readings that constitutes the Byzantine text-type is demonstrably late). The following Byzantine variants are included in NA²⁷, except for those with asterisks, which are listed in HF.

five omissions—1:5, 8, 18; 2:5, 9 six additions—2:13; 2:30; 3:8, 16, 21; 4:13

five word substitutions—1:17, 25; 2:15, 30; 3:14

seven transpositions—1:1*, 8, 16–17, 28; 2:21, 27*; 4:3*

Miscellaneous variants are found at 1:11, 27, 28; 2:4 (two times), 5, 15*; 3:6, 10*, 11; 4:19*.

In addition to the material we have surveyed so far, it is very helpful to focus on a few selected witnesses and examine them in greater detail, noting even insignificant variations that would normally not be included in a critical edition of the Greek NT. An excursus at the end of this commentary summarizes the results of my own collation of nine manuscripts plus the Majority text. Among several interesting facts, we should note the patterns that emerge by distinguishing “function words” (such as conjunctions and prepositions) from nouns and verbs. On every column, except for the Majority text, the omission of function words clearly exceeds the number of insertions. Scribal mistakes in these circumstances were common. We should therefore not place too much weight on the fact that important manuscripts or text-types support minor omissions. In particular, it seems unnecessary for NA²⁷ to include brackets at such points as 1:23, 24; 2:4; 3:10 (I am less sure about 3:7, 12).

This commentary pays special attention to the readings of P⁴⁶. Not only is it the oldest extant manuscript of the Pauline Epistles, but the basic character of its text is widely recognized as of the greatest importance. At the same time, its scribe was not particularly careful (sloppy omissions, for example, are frequent, but these are easily recognized), and his tendencies are most instructive with regard to scribal activity.[\[29\]](#) Moreover, this document contains a number of fascinating readings that deserve careful attention (see esp. at 1:11 and 3:12).[30]

Exegetical History

The common practice of listing commentators who side with one interpretation or another, though it has certain advantages, can be very misleading. For example, a particular commentator may have nuanced his position in a way that sets it apart from the views of others included on the same list. Even if the exegetical conclusion is the same, the various commentators have possibly reached their decision in different ways. In some cases, the conclusion does not cohere with the broader interpretive framework adopted by a particular writer (and possibly preferred by the reader) and should perhaps be rejected for that reason.

The point is that we cannot properly evaluate a writer's position on some individual exegetical question if we are ignorant of that writer's own context. In other words, commentators have themselves become part of the exegetical tradition that needs to be interpreted. What follows is a very modest attempt to minimize our problem by giving a critical summary of selected commentators who have been particularly influential and who are referred to with some frequency in this commentary.[31]

Chrysostom. References to Philippians abound in the writings of the fathers.[32] Expositions of the whole epistle, however, are not numerous, and most of these (including those by Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret, Ambrosiaster, and Pelagius) consist of rather brief comments on the text. Chrysostom's homilies on Philippians, though not precisely in commentary form, constitute the most significant patristic exposition of this letter. Some of the material, particularly toward the end of each homily, where he seeks to relate the exposition to the needs of his congregation, has little exegetical value.[33] At other times, as in his discussion of the Carmen Christi, he allows heretical opinion to set the agenda for his exposition.

In general, however, Chrysostom shows genuine sensitivity to the historical meaning of the text. He is alert to possible ambiguities in the apostle's language, for example, and knows how to deal with those and comparable problems concisely and clearly. He is also quite capable in assessing the theological import of the text, though we may want to dissent here and there, especially in his formulation of works vis-à-vis divine grace (e.g., at 1:29, where he says that if Paul ascribes virtues entirely to God, that is because “the greatest part” comes from God; a similar concern is reflected at 2:13).

Strange as it may sound, Chrysostom, along with other Greek fathers, can be particularly helpful when he does not offer an opinion on an exegetical problem. As a native Greek speaker, his innate sense of the language—but not necessarily his conscious reflection on it—provides an important bridge between the modern commentator and the Pauline writings (with the qualification that Paul’s Greek was of course not identical to Chrysostom’s). Educated speakers are notoriously unreliable in analyzing their own language. If Chrysostom weighs two competing interpretations, his conclusion should be valued as an important opinion and no more. If, on the other hand, he fails to address a linguistic problem because he does not appear to perceive a possible ambiguity, his silence is of the greatest value in helping us determine how Paul’s first readers were likely to have interpreted the text.[\[34\]](#)

Aquinas. Greek medieval writers, such as Theophylact and Oecumenius, were strongly influenced by Chrysostom, though their commentaries have some independent value as well. Several expositors in the Latin tradition also deserve attention, but I have chosen to comment on Aquinas for some important reasons. Although modern exegesis has little to learn from Aquinas’s exposition of Philippians (it has in fact played a very small role in the writing of the present commentary), one should not infer that the exposition is of poor quality. On the contrary, it is quite excellent. To the extent that we may use the term grammatico-historical for works prior to the modern period, Aquinas’s commentary is deserving of that adjective, because only seldom does he allow extrabiblical preoccupations to displace the meaning of the original (e.g., at 4:15, which he interprets as grounds for the pope to “take from one church to help another”).

Moreover, the most characteristic feature of his approach is the abundance of biblical quotations used to throw light on the text. Aquinas’s commentary, in effect, is one of the best illustrations of an exegete allowing the Bible to be its own interpreter. One might wish for a larger proportion of specifically Pauline parallels (Paul’s distinctiveness tends to dissolve in the ocean of biblical quotations), but only occasionally are his citations ill-chosen. As for Aquinas’s theological reflections, it would not be difficult to find disagreeable features in them, but the dominant tone is unobjectionable. In fact, building as he does on an Augustinian foundation, his emphasis on God's (predestinating) grace shows through at key points (e.g., at 1:11; 2:13; 4:3).

For anyone who views Scholasticism in a purely negative light, Aquinas's exegesis can be an excellent antidote. Given his stature and influence in the late medieval period, this brief work stands as something of a milestone in the long history of expositions on Philippians. Nevertheless, the commentary is not based on the Greek text and Aquinas is often unaware of important interpretive questions that affect our understanding of the epistle as a whole.[\[35\]](#)

Calvin. We need not rehearse here the developments that took place during the Renaissance period in the critical study of ancient documents. Some writers, such as Erasmus (see Rummel 1986) and Lefèvre (see Hughes 1984), produced useful paraphrases and annotations on the Pauline Epistles that influenced the course of NT exegesis. By common consent, however, it is John Calvin's commentaries that mark a new epoch in the exposition of Scripture (see Parker 1971).

Calvin combined, in an unusual way, a commitment to the humanistic study of the classics with unswerving devotion to the final authority of Scripture; but he also combined his faith in the distinctive tenets of the Protestant Reformation with a high regard for church tradition. In addition, Calvin was a student of Chrysostom, whose brevity in exposition he regarded as a model of commentary writing. All of those fine features, and more, are clearly displayed in his commentary on Philippians.

The work is not without its faults, of course. Occasionally he is distracted by his own opponents (e.g., at 2:11), and a few of his exegetical ideas, being based on the limited knowledge available in his day, are no longer tenable (e.g., in attributing an active meaning to the passive εὑρεθῶ [heurethō, be found] in 3:9). But the total effect of his commentary is consistently positive; indeed, one often wonders how a work of this character could have been written prior to the modern period. For example, Calvin's regard for Scripture might easily have led him (as it leads many even today) to press the force of Paul's language beyond what it can bear. Instead, we find him exercising commendable restraint and sensitivity when dealing with problem passages (cf. the second additional note on 1:27 below).

Like Aquinas, moreover, Calvin possessed a powerfully synthetic mind that enabled him to expound Philippians with an eye to the teaching of Scripture as a whole. Yet, it would be very unfortunate to assume that he allowed an abstract theological system to impose itself upon the text. Any fair reading of his work on Philippians must recognize that its theological richness was not imported from outside the Bible but arose from a responsible handling of the text.

Meyer. It is not possible to draw a sharp line that divides the modern, “scientific” period from everything that preceded it. We can identify a stage, however, when the intensive textual work of several generations begins to bear fruit in a dramatic way.[36] The commentaries of H. A. W. Meyer were not the first to exemplify a “scientific” approach to the NT text, but the erudition, finesse, and magnitude of his work made the “Meyer series” the lodestar for commentators during the second half of the nineteenth century and the early decades of the twentieth.

Meyer’s greatest strength was his ability to perceive problems and to ask questions that would not occur to most of us. There is hardly a grammatical or exegetical issue that he fails to consider and carefully weigh after cataloguing the whole range of opinion on the subject. Unfortunately, this approach sometimes leads to unnecessarily complicated discussions, to a merciless dissection of textual details, and to a measure of overconfidence regarding the validity of his conclusions. Meyer’s series is the paragon of encyclopedic commentaries that manage, unwittingly, to obscure the broad and weightier teaching of Scripture. Perhaps for that reason (and because of its age) Meyer’s work is seldom quoted nowadays. That, too, is unfortunate. The serious student of the Greek NT, even today, can always learn something from this master.

Lightfoot. German scholarship, as represented primarily by Meyer, was imported to English territory by several British scholars, most notably Henry Alford (1871–75).[37] But the Anglo-Saxon world was to produce a master of its own. As unpretentious as Meyer was pedantic, and as lucid as Meyer was cryptic—but not one whit inferior in erudition—J. B. Lightfoot would break new ground with his extraordinary commentaries on the shorter epistles of Paul.

Lightfoot is often credited (or blamed) for helping students of Paul realize that there was more to the apostle than polemics and doctrine. In the preface to his commentary, as already pointed out (cf. n19, above), he sets Philippians over against Galatians; he further argues that Philippians reveals “the normal type of the Apostle’s teaching.” The substance of the gospel, he concludes, “is neither a dogmatic system nor an ethical code, but a Person and a life.” We do no justice to Lightfoot if we infer from these words that he regarded doctrine as unimportant. In the same preface he states: “Dogmatic forms are the buttresses on the scaffold-pole of the building, not the building itself.”

It is still true, however, that Lightfoot minimizes somewhat the theological import of Philippians. Interestingly, that factor may have something to do with the fact that his commentary on this letter is not as highly valued as his Galatians, even by scholars for whom theology is not a great priority. But that comment must not be misunderstood. If his commentary on Philippians is a notch lower in quality than his commentary on Galatians, it is still several notches higher than most other English commentaries on Philippians. Vincent’s contribution to the International Critical Commentary series, though hardly a work to be despised, only highlights the contrast between Lightfoot and those who have followed him.

Lohmeyer. Meyer’s Philippians commentary for his series went through four editions (1847–74). It was then revised by A. H. Franke in 1886, but this edition did not make an impact. A more thorough and important revision—really a new work—was produced by E. Haupt (1897 and 1902). Yet another edition was assigned to Ernst Lohmeyer, whose commentary appeared in 1930. A scholar of the highest caliber who had already published a ground-breaking monograph on the Carmen Christi,^[38] Lohmeyer set a new agenda for the exegesis of Philippians.

Lohmeyer’s style and approach were vastly different from those of his predecessors. Grammatical questions were relegated to the footnotes, while the commentary itself became more accessible, even to nonscholars. Most notably, Lohmeyer set himself to prove a bold thesis regarding the purpose and character of Philippians. Using the tools honed by the history-of-religions approach, he argued that the whole epistle could be understood as a tractate on martyrdom. His position is best summarized by reproducing his outline of the body of the letter:

Paul’s martyrdom (1:12–26)

The community’s martyrdom (1:27–2:16)

Helpers in martyrdom (2:17–30)

Dangers in martyrdom (3:1–21)

Last admonitions in martyrdom (4:1–9)

In spite of its many valuable insights, the commentary leaves the distinct impression that the text is being adjusted to fit a thesis. Accordingly, Lohmeyer's broad interpretation of the letter has not been adopted by recent exegetes.

Contemporary Works. No major German commentary on Philippians appeared for several decades. The Roman Catholic scholar J. Gnllka contributed a substantive and highly praised volume on Philippians to the Herder series (2nd ed., 1976). A novelty of this commentary is the decision to treat the text as consisting of two distinct letters of Paul. Apart from that feature, the exegesis reflects a relatively cautious approach.

Not many French works since Rilliet's in the last century (1841) have had a significant impact on scholarship. Bonnard's commentary, which appeared in 1950, was well received, but its successor in the same series has been more influential. This is the work of J.-F. Collange (1979), who distinguishes three different letters in the text of Philippians. His exposition is clear and reveals the thought of an independent mind.^[39]

The first major English commentary on the Greek text of Philippians after Vincent (1897) was the contribution to the Word Biblical Commentary series by the evangelical scholar G. F. Hawthorne. Distinguishing this work are the carefully compiled bibliographies, close attention to the original language, and a refreshing balance between conservative and innovative elements. Because Hawthorne's work was the most important commentary on Philippians when the present volume was originally written, it seemed wise to engage him quite frequently, particularly where my approach presents an alternative way of dealing with the text (for a more detailed evaluation, see Silva 1984).^[40]

Finally, special attention needs to be given to the extraordinary commentary by W. Schenk (1984), which came into my hands after I had completed an initial draft of the first edition of the present volume. This work is the first thorough application of modern linguistics to the exegesis of a NT book. And although such an approach may sound dull to many readers, there is nothing boring about this commentary. In fact, Schenk has such a fertile mind and forceful style that any other commentary looks dull beside his. Some readers may be initially put off by the terminology, but Schenk uses a fairly limited number of technical terms and his exposition is at any rate sparkingly clear.

Schenk's penetrating discussions have at many points confirmed my judgment, usually on similar grounds (e.g., note his insistence on contextual synonymy); at many other points he has challenged my conclusions. His work no doubt deserves more attention than I have given to it. Unhappily, Schenk seems unable to keep his ideas in check. For example, while it is useful to note the correspondence between "being confident of this" (1:6) and "this I pray" (1:9), one must question the judgment of describing the two verbs as contextually identical. These and other features, however, should not keep readers from enjoying the rich exegetical fare he has to offer.

Addendum. During the past decade and a half, the vigor of Philippians scholarship has been striking. Soon after the first edition of the present work, Peter O'Brien published a commentary on the Greek text of Philippians (1991) that may be fairly characterized as monumental. O'Brien's control of the scholarly literature is enviable, and the author can always be trusted to present the views of others accurately and respectfully. Moreover, his handling of the text combines caution with conviction. Many years from now, students of Philippians will continue to be grateful for such a dependable exposition of this Pauline letter.

As if that were not enough, about the same time Gordon Fee turned his considerable skills to Philippians and produced a major commentary on this letter (1995), characterized by an emphasis on the theme of friendship (see above, p. 19). Although the series for which it was written (NICNT) is formally addressed to readers of the English Bible, Fee provides thorough discussions of the Greek, mainly in the footnotes. The ease with which he moves from technical details (such as text-critical problems) to matters of theological and pastoral import can only evoke admiration. Moreover, Fee manages to write in a very lively style. His enthusiasm, to be sure, has a downside. Overstatements are frequent, and in the process of making a case for his interpretations, there is a tendency to represent the views of others in less than accurate fashion.^[41] But for readers who learn to handle his dicta with caution, this commentary will prove to be a jewel.

Other valuable commentaries, if less ambitious, have appeared since 1988. In German, there is the concise and solid exposition by Ulrich Müller (1993). In French, Georges Gander has written a commentary that focuses on the ancient versions (1993), and Rinaldo Fabris has produced a substantive work in Italian (2000).^[42] In English, several commentaries of a more popular character have appeared (e.g., Melick 1991; Marshall 1992; Fee 1999; Osiek 2000; Cousar 2001). Special note, however, should be made of Markus Bockmuehl's contribution to Black's New Testament Commentary (1998). Seldom does one come across so much erudition with such a light touch. Balanced and clearly written, it must be considered one of the best available commentaries on any Pauline epistle—and the first choice on Philippians for the serious English reader.

In addition to these commentaries, Philippians scholarship has been well served during the past fifteen years by the appearance of monographs that explore one or another aspect of this letter (several that focus on literary structure and discourse analysis have already been noted above under "Literary Context"). L. G. Bloomquist (1993) analyzes the theme of suffering in Philippians, while T. C. Geoffrion (1993) focuses on Paul's use of political and military imagery (esp. Phil. 1:27–30). Both Lukas Bormann (1995) and Peter Pilhofer (1995; 2000) have greatly advanced our knowledge of the city of Philippi and related the new information to our understanding of the letter (Bormann focuses on Phil. 4:10–20; Pilhofer 2000, which is over 900 pages long, provides a catalog of inscriptions from Philippi).

Davorin Peterlin makes a persuasive case for the view that disunity in the Philippian church provides "the element which thematically binds the whole letter together" (1995: 217), although he goes beyond the evidence by arguing that the tensions focused on Paul himself (see my review, Silva 1996). Veronika Koperski (1996) provides an extremely detailed exegesis of Phil. 3:7–11 and shows the value of this passage for NT theology (see my review, Silva 1998). The significance of imprisonment in Paul's rhetoric is explored by C. S. Wansink (1996). G. W. Peterman (1997) analyzes the language of "giving and receiving" and concludes that Paul seeks to correct the Philippians' Greco-Roman understanding of the gift they have sent to the apostle. On the basis of archaeological and literary evidence, Peter Oakes (2001) argues that Philippians is a call to unity in the face of (economic) suffering. Finally, D. K. Williams (2002) explores the theme of the cross as a rhetorical metaphor used by Paul to deal with a variety of topics, including his personal and apostolic integrity.

All of these works, as well as a very large number of periodical articles, have helped to advance our understanding of Philippians. Some of their specific contributions will be noted in the present commentary at the relevant points.

Commentaries

The following list, though by no means exhaustive, is intended as a fairly comprehensive guide to major commentaries on Philippians in chronological order. Asterisked items are those through which I worked systematically or which otherwise played an important role in the initial writing of this commentary; these works are normally referred to in the text by author's last name only, when the reference corresponds to the verse under discussion.

- Ambrosiaster (4th cent.[?]; PL 17:426–44)
- Marius Victorinus (4th cent.; Victorinus 1981)
- Theodore of Mopsuestia (4th cent.; Swete 1880)
- *John Chrysostom (4th cent.; PG 62:177–298)
- Pelagius (5th cent.; Souter 1922–26)
- Theodoret of Cyrrhus (5th cent.; PG 82:558–90)
- Oecumenius Triccae (10th cent.; PG 118:1260–1326)
- Herveus (Burgidolensis Monachus) of Maine (12th cent.; PL 181:1279–1314)
- Theophylact (12th cent.; PG 124:1139–1204)
- Thomas Aquinas (13th cent.; Aquinas 1969)
- Erasmus (16th cent.; Erasmus 1962 [vol. 6, Annotations; vol. 7, Paraphrases])
- Cornelius à Lapide (16th cent.; Lapide 1864)
- *Calvin (16th cent.; Calvin 1965)
- Bengel (1742; Bengel 1855)
- Hengel, van (1838)
- Rilliet (1841)
- Wiesinger (1858)
- Eadie (1859)
- Weiss, B. (1859)
- Ellicott (1865)
- *Lightfoot (1868)

Alford (1871–75)
Johnstone (1875)
*Meyer (1885; from German 4th ed. 1847–48)
Lipsius (1892)
Klöpfer (1893)
Kennedy, H. A. A. (1897–1910)
*Vincent (1897)
Haupt (1902)
Ewald (1923)
Dibelius (1925)
Michael (1928)
*Lohmeyer (1930; 9th ed. 1953)
Greijdanus (1937)
Lanski (1937)
Bonnard (1950)
Müller, J. J. (1955)
Beare (1959)
Barth, K. (1962)
Boor, de (1962)
Friedrich (1962)
Hendriksen (1962)
Matter (1965)
Turrado (1965)
Klijn (1969)
Ernst (1974)
Caird (1976)
*Gnilka (1976)
Martin (1976; not to be confused with his earlier contribution to TNTC)
Kent (1978)
Barth, G. (1979)
*Collange (1979)
Bruce (1983)
*Hawthorne (1983)
Motyer (1984)
*Schenk (1984)
O'Brien (1991)
Melick (1991)

Marshall (1992)
Gander (1993)
Müller, U. B. (1993)
Fee (1995)
Bockmuehl (1998)
Fabris (2000)
Osiek (2000)
Cousar (2001)

- I. Opening (1:1–11)
- II. Paul's Missionary Report (1:12–26)
- III. A Call to Sanctification (1:27–2:30)
- IV. Doctrinal Polemics (3:1–4:1)
- V. Final Concerns (4:2–23)

I. Opening (1:1–11)

All of the NT epistles that bear Paul's name exhibit certain common structural traits, one of which is the natural inclusion of an introductory paragraph clearly set off from the body of the letter. This paragraph normally consists of a standard salutation, immediately followed by a thanksgiving.

Some variations occur. For example, Paul expands the salutations in Romans, Galatians, and Titus by the inclusion of material that anticipates important themes developed in those letters. On five occasions—2 Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, 1 Timothy, and Titus—he omits a thanksgiving and therefore appears to move from the salutation right into the body of the letter, though one could argue that the benedictions in 2 Cor. 1:3–7 and Eph. 1:3–14 parallel the thanksgivings in the other letters. (As for Galatians, the rebuke in 1:6–10 takes on special significance when one realizes that it corresponds structurally to the section where the reader expects a warm word of thanksgiving to God.)

It is not always pointed out, however, that Philippians and Colossians differ from the other epistles by the inclusion of a substantive prayer of intercession following the thanksgiving (Phil. 1:9–11; Col. 1:9–12). To be sure, the distinction between petition and thanksgiving should not be pressed, since Paul can move from one to the other very easily, as in Rom. 1:8–10 and Philem. 4–6 (and may not the assurance in 1 Cor. 1:8 also be understood as an expression of Paul's prayer?). Moreover, the prayer in 2 Thess. 1:11–12, though somewhat removed from the thanksgiving in verses 3–4, certainly parallels Phil. 1:9–11 and Col. 1:9–12.

In spite of these qualifications, Philippians and Colossians correspond to each other so closely, both structurally and conceptually, that the relationship deserves special attention. The exposition that follows, therefore, divides the introduction into three sections:

- A. Salutation (1:1–2)
- B. Thanksgiving (1:3–8)
 - 1. Initial statement (1:3–5)
 - 2. Expansion (1:6–8)
- C. Prayer (1:9–11)

Exegesis and Exposition

¹[From] Paul and Timothy, servants of ¹Christ Jesus¹, to all in Philippi, including overseers and deacons, who are holy through their union with Christ Jesus: ²Grace and peace to you from God our Father and our Lord Jesus Christ.

³¹I thank¹ my God every time I remember you [or, for your every remembrance of me]—⁴yes, always, in every prayer of mine on behalf of all of you; and it is with joy that I make my prayer ⁵because of your participation in the work of the gospel from ¹the¹ beginning of your faith until this very moment.

⁶Moreover, I am confident of this truth: the one who began a good work in you will bring it to completion at the day of ¹Christ Jesus¹. ⁷And indeed it is right that I should feel this way about all of you—for I hold you dear in my heart [or, because you hold me dear in your heart], since you all have participated with me in the grace of my apostolic ministry, both when I have been in chains and when I have defended and confirmed the gospel. ⁸Truly God is ¹my¹ witness how I long for all of you with the intense love of Christ Jesus.

⁹Now this is what I am praying for: that your love may ¹abound¹ more and more in knowledge and in total discernment, ¹⁰so that you may approve the things that really matter and thus show yourselves pure and blameless for the day of Christ, ¹¹that is, filled with the fruit of right conduct that comes through Jesus Christ ¹to the glory and praise of God¹.

A. Salutation (1:1–2)

The standard opening in the letters of the Hellenistic period consisted of three words: name of sender (nominative case), name of addressee (dative case), and the infinitive χαίρειν (chairein, usually translated “greeting”).^[1] Variations were minor: inversion of sender and addressee, further identification of the sender, and strengthening of the greeting (e.g., by adding the infinitive ἐρρῶσθαι, errōsthai, good health).

Paul follows the convention in general yet imparts his own distinctiveness by changing chairein to the cognate χάρις (charis, grace), which calls attention to the very essence of the Christian message; by adding εἰρήνη (eirēnē, peace), a reminder of the rich themes of spiritual welfare evoked by the Hebrew equivalent, שָׁלוֹם (šālôm); and by specifying the true source of our well-being, “God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.” (Note that 1 and 2 Timothy add ἔλεος, eleos, mercy; further, Colossians and 1 Thessalonians vary slightly from this format.)

It is also instructive, however, to note certain variations that turn up when we compare the greetings in Paul’s epistles. First, Paul in Philippians includes Timothy as one of the senders. This feature is also found in 2 Corinthians, Colossians, and Philemon, while 1–2 Thessalonians include Silvanus (Silas) as well as Timothy (1 Corinthians mentions Sosthenes; Galatians has “all the brethren who are with me”).

Although commentators are correct in pointing out that this feature does not indicate coauthorship, it would be a mistake to ignore or downplay its significance. Not only was Timothy actively involved in the evangelization of Macedonia and Achaia (Acts 16–18), but he also appears to have provided special support for Paul during the latter’s imprisonment (Phil. 2:20–22), a factor that accounts for Timothy’s inclusion in the salutations of Colossians and Philemon. There is also good reason to believe (see comments on 2:19–30) that the Philippians had a strong attachment to Timothy. This faithful minister, therefore, constituted a link that bonded the apostle with his Macedonian congregation; it would have been surprising had his name been omitted.

It should further be noted that the inclusion of Timothy’s name was more than a friendly or sentimental gesture. Paul, though self-conscious of his unique apostolic authority, did not intend to monopolize the attention of his converts; and his teachings, while distinctive in emphasis (“my gospel,” Rom. 2:16; 16:25; 2 Tim. 2:8), were hardly idiosyncratic in substance. We may then recognize that the apostle, by joining Timothy’s name to his, calls upon his coworker as a corroborating witness of the truths he expounds. Timothy, in turn, lends his influence and authority to Paul’s words, which he commends as an expression of his own thoughts.

Second, notice the omission of ἀπόστολος (apostolos, apostle). It is intriguing to find that of the four epistles in which Paul does not introduce himself as an apostle, three were addressed to Macedonian churches: Philippians and 1–2 Thessalonians (the fourth is Philemon, where the delicacy of the occasion, as seen especially in verses 17–20, accounts for this feature). In view of the early date of 1–2 Thessalonians (and assuming a later date for Galatians), we may consider the possibility that Paul had not yet found it necessary to emphasize his apostolic authority, which began to suffer systematic challenges during the third missionary journey (so also Perkin 1986: 99). On the other hand, we should note 1 Thess. 2:7–8, 17–20 and 3:1–10, passages that suggest a special and mutual affection bonding Paul with the believers in Thessalonica.

However we explain the absence of apostolos in 1–2 Thessalonians, its absence in Philippians is generally understood as evidence of the warm relationship existing between Paul and the saints in Philippi. Not only was there no need to remind the Philippians of Paul’s authority—Paul may have even considered such a reminder inappropriate in view of the character of this epistle as, at least in part, a thank-you note.

Third, Paul identifies himself and Timothy as δοῦλοι (douloi, servants, slaves). This designation, although common in Paul, occurs in the salutation of only two other letters, Romans and Titus. Here it takes on special significance precisely because it replaces apostolos. In view of the prominence that Philippians gives to the subject of humility, we can hardly doubt that Paul is here exploiting the word’s reference to lowly service rather than suggesting the notion of privileged position.^[2]

I find it somewhat misleading, however, to say that “the word has pejorative force here.”^[3] Since “the foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men” (1 Cor. 1:25), the humility that appears contemptible to unbelievers receives God’s praise. Moreover, the truth that he who was rich “became poor” by taking the form of a doulos (2 Cor. 8:9; Phil. 2:7) injects into this word, paradoxically, an undeniable dignity. Thus, quite apart from the Hebrew OT use of עֶבֶד (‘ebed, servant) with reference to the prophetic office, the Greek doulos in Christian parlance is not an insult, but the highest commendation possible.

It has often been pointed out that this passage is the only instance in the Pauline letters in which the apostle shares the title doulos with anyone else. Hawthorne (1983: 3–4) puts great emphasis on this fact: he calls it “a radical departure from Paul’s standard procedure” and argues that Paul was here willing to share “his otherwise carefully and jealously guarded uniqueness” to teach the Philippians a lesson in humility. This remark seems to me an overstatement, since Paul clearly had no reservations about using the term σύνδουλος (syndoulos, fellow-servant) with reference to Epaphras and Tychicus (Col. 1:7; 4:7; Hawthorne accepts the Pauline authorship of Colossians); but I would not wish to deny that an element of humility is indeed present here.

Fourth, we should note the unique reference to ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνους (episkopois kai diakonois, overseers and deacons). As is well known, the Pastoral Epistles, and 1 Tim. 3 in particular, stress the importance of these two church offices, though this factor is interpreted by large segments of current scholarship as evidence of a late date. Outside the Pastorals, the word episkopos and the related term πρεσβύτερος (presbyteros, elder) do not occur at all in the Pauline corpus. Clearly, the presence of episkopois and diakonois here requires some explanation.

One suggestion is to understand these titles as functional (describing activity) rather than official in some technical sense. However, though Paul can certainly refer to church workers without specifying an office (cf. Rom. 12:8; Gal. 6:6; 1 Thess. 5:12), here he must have “in view individual members of the congregation who are unequivocally characterised by the designation. . . . Otherwise the addition has no meaning” (H. Beyer, TDNT 2:616). It seems clear that “at the time of the epistle there are thus two coordinated offices” (H. Beyer, TDNT 2:89).

But whether or not we accept the official status of these individuals, we must still ask why they are singled out. E. Best links the mention of these officers with the omission of apostolos; he assumes that a letter from Philippi to Paul had been signed with the words “from all the saints with the bishops and deacons,” suggesting a distinction between believers and officers. “Paul writes back to them but in so doing he very quietly rebukes them by the omission of his own title of ‘apostle’” (Best 1968: 374). This view, however, is at bottom speculative; moreover, the irony suggested by Best is so subtle that the original readers (like most commentators since) would most likely have missed it altogether.

Collange argues plausibly that Paul begins by applying “gentleness and persuasion”; the titles show his regard for them and thus prepare the way for the rebukes and criticisms that occur in the body of the letter. If Collange’s view should prove unsatisfactory, the best alternative is the common interpretation (as early as Chrysostom) that Paul singles out the church officers as those primarily responsible for raising the offering delivered to Paul.

B. Thanksgiving (1:3–8)

Just as in Rom. 1:8, where Paul first expresses his gratitude, giving also a briefly stated reason for it, and then proceeds to expand on that reason in verses 9–12 (including an expression of his desire to see the Roman believers), so also here in Philippians we may analyze the thanksgiving as consisting of an initial statement (1:3–5) followed by an expansion (vv. 6–8, which include an expression of his love, “I long for all of you”). Modern editions of the Greek NT, it is true, usually indicate a more significant grammatical pause between verses 6 and 7 than between verses 5 and 6, with a full pause between verses 7 and 8 (cf. also Gnllka, who believes the thanksgiving comes to an end in verse 6). In Greek, however, the distinction between clauses and sentences admits of very few hard-and-fast rules, and one need not insist that the clause of verse 7, though it is introduced by καθώς (kathōs, even as), should be regarded as more independent than the participial clause of verse 6 (see the first additional note on 1:5). At any rate, my division of this section between verses 5 and 6 depends not on syntactical or grammatical considerations but on the conceptual shift that seems to occur at that point.

1. Initial Statement (1:3–5)

The syntax of these verses is particularly difficult to unravel. Is the main verb εὐχαριστῶ (eucharistō, I thank) to be linked with the prepositional phrase that follows immediately, ἐπὶ πάσῃ τῇ μνηίᾳ ὑμῶν (epi pasē tē mneia hymōn, lit., upon every remembrance of you)? Or should we instead link it with the prepositional phrase in verse 5, ἐπὶ τῇ κοινωνίᾳ ὑμῶν (epi tē koinōnia hymōn, because of your participation), so that the intervening words from epi in verse 3 to the end of verse 4 should be enclosed within dashes? Again, should πάντοτε (pantote, always, v. 4) be construed with what precedes or with what follows? Similarly, is μετὰ χαρᾶς (meta charas, with joy) part of the preceding or the subsequent clause? Several other questions could be asked, increasing the combined number of possibilities to a staggering total. (See the additional notes for the most likely possibilities and for a discussion of the more substantive problem regarding the syntax of epi pasē tē mneia hymōn.)

Attempting to answer all those questions can be a profitable linguistic exercise, though from Paul’s perspective we should perhaps regard them as pseudo-questions. The point is that all of the syntactical combinations yield the same sense. (The only possible significant issue is whether δέησιν [deēsin, petition, prayer, v. 4] can be used with reference to thanksgiving, as would be the case if construed with what follows, or only with reference to petition. See additional notes on 1:4.) The freedom of Greek word order has the advantage of providing the writer with a great variety of expressive resources; it also has the disadvantage of creating considerable ambiguity. A Greek writer, however, could foresee the potential for equivocation and guard against it. In the present sentence the ambiguities, touching no matter of substance, probably did not even occur to Paul.

One may wish to ask how it is possible for such a sentence not to create a semantic problem. The simple answer is repetition. Paul makes reference to his praying in four different clauses with the words eucharistō, mneia, and deēsis (two times); thus, whether we construe pantote with one or another of these words, the force of the statement is the same. The exegetical value of this rather obvious point is that it calls attention to a distinctive element in this thanksgiving: Paul is not being thoughtlessly repetitive but deliberately emphatic (cf. introduction, “Language and Style”). While we find some ambiguity of construction in other thanksgivings (Colossians, 1 Thessalonians, Philemon), those are not nearly as complicated as the present passage. It is the intensity of Paul’s emotion that accounts for the syntax; it also accounts for the fourfold recurrence of pas (in the forms pasē [two times], pantote, and pantōn), for the apparent emphasis on joy (meta charas), and for the forcefulness of subsequent expressions (from the first day; being persuaded).

In verse 5, however, we encounter a syntactical ambiguity of greater significance: How shall we construe “from the first day until now”? We have three basic options, each of which yields a different sense.

1. Most versions and commentators construe this clause with the first part of the verse, tē koinōnia hymōn (your participation), indicating that from the very beginning the Philippians have been participating in the work of the gospel.
2. An alternative view is to take the clause as the emphatic beginning of a new thought altogether (“I have been persuaded from the first day until now that . . .”), but Meyer correctly points out that this construction tends to shift attention away from the clear concern of the passage, namely, the Philippians’ conduct.

3. The third option is to see a reference to Paul's own prayers: he has been thanking God from the very beginning. This interpretation, which implies a linking of the clause with the end of verse 4 (less likely with eucharistō, as Bengel 1855: 766 suggests), fits nicely with Paul's emphasis on the intensity of his prayer. Moreover, it could be argued that it yields a smoother syntax: if the clause were to modify tē koinōnia, as in the first interpretation, one would expect the repetition of the article before ἀπό (apo, from). In fact, however, the absence of the article before an attributive is not unusual (BDF §272).

In support of the first and common interpretation is the good rule-of-thumb that we should prefer a natural connection—such as taking together linguistic units that are close to one another—unless we have weighty reasons for doing otherwise. Most important, however, is the consideration that in verse 5 Paul has shifted attention from the fact of his prayer of thanksgiving to the reason for it. Meyer perceptively emphasizes that the constancy of the Philippians' commitment to the gospel "is the very thing which not only supplies the motive for the apostle's thankfulness, but forms also the ground of his just confidence for the future." My paraphrase above adopts this usual understanding of verse 5 and further assumes that the only necessary pause is in the middle of verse 4.

We may proceed to ask whether the present thanksgiving differs in any substantive way from those found in the other letters. Two matters come up for attention: the explicit note of joy and the reference to the Philippians' participation in the gospel.

Although the very mention of thanksgiving in his epistles is clear evidence of Paul's joy, only the introductions to Philippians and Philemon (see Philem. 7) contain the word chara. One might not want to make too much of this factor if we had no other indications of its significance. But we do. In fact, Paul here announces one of the most obvious themes in the epistle—joy in the midst of adversity (see introduction, "Distinctive Teaching"). Quite clearly, the Philippians are troubled by Paul's circumstances and Paul wishes at the very opening of the letter to allay their concerns by assuring them of his deep, personal contentment. Yet, we should note that the apostle's joyful response to his adversity arises not from a consideration of personal well-being but from the recognition that his apostolic ministry is bearing fruit, as he makes clear in verse 12.

(Conversely, his greatest fear consisted in the possibility that his ministry might come to naught; see comments on 2:16.)

What needs particular emphasis is that Paul's overflowing gratefulness focuses on a concrete expression of the Philippians' care for him as a minister of the gospel. In other thanksgiving sections (see esp. Rom. 1:18 and 1 Thess. 1:8) Paul commends believers for contributing to the advance of the faith, but the term koinōnia is included only here and in Philem. 6. Although the word may have the general meaning of "communion" or "fellowship" in this passage,[4] such renderings as "participation" (NASB) and "partnership" (NIV) more accurately bring out the activity of the Philippians in promoting the work of the gospel.

Can we be more specific as to what that activity entailed? Although G. Panikulam may be correct in stating that this expression indicates "the entire response the Philippians gave to the good news they received,"[5] it seems unreasonable to deny that the Philippians' financial contributions, understood as concrete evidence of the genuineness of that response, must have been "foremost in the Apostle's mind" (Lightfoot). When speaking of the Macedonians' contribution to the Jerusalem saints (Rom. 15:26; 2 Cor. 8:4; cf. 9:13), Paul uses the same noun, koinōnia, with the preposition eis, though the construction is not exactly parallel.[6] Moreover, Paul uses the verbal form koinōneō with reference to financial contribution in Rom. 12:13; Gal. 6:6; and especially Phil. 4:15, a passage strangely ignored by Panikulam and others in spite of the additional parallel to 1:5 in the phrase "from the beginning of the gospel." (Remarkably, Schenk 1984: 95 appeals to 4:15 as evidence that koinōnia must have an active meaning, yet he denies a reference to the offering. The only explanation for this move must be his conviction that 4:10–20 constitutes a different document.)

In summary, Paul's thanksgiving in this letter is distinguished by emphatic repetitions and emotional intensity. The apostle's joyful gratitude flows from an appreciation of his converts' consistent support of his ministry and care for his needs, from the very beginnings of their Christian experience to the most recent contribution, which in effect occasioned the present letter. Yet Paul is careful to interpret their gifts, not as intended for him personally (contrast μοι, moi, to me, 4:15), but rather for the advance of the gospel.

2. Expansion (1:6–8)

In verse 6 Paul gives us a further, but closely related, reason for his joyful sense of gratitude—his assurance that God’s work cannot be thwarted. Theologians who speak of salvation as being God’s from beginning to end are not using mere rhetoric, for this is precisely Paul’s conception as he addresses the Philippians regarding their share in the gospel: “Do not misunderstand my commendation; it was not you who began this work, but God, and he will complete it” (cf. the qualification in Gal. 4:9).

This paraphrase overstates the contrast between verses 5 and 6, but it helps us to focus on a point often ignored by commentators yet fundamental to this epistle, namely, the tension that exists between the believers’ accountability for their own spiritual conduct and their need to rely totally on God’s grace in order to meet that obligation (“the paradox of all religion,” says Lightfoot; cf. also Chrysostom’s suggestive comments on verse 6). Some will no doubt object to this construction as an attempt to introduce modern categories of systematic theology (human responsibility and divine sovereignty) into a Pauline statement that is motivated by different concerns. My comments on 2:12–13, however, will seek to show that no reasonable exegesis of that passage can dispense with these categories, for they are thoroughly Pauline.

Apart from a consideration of 2:12–13, it may still be asked whether we are justified in seeing these theological concerns in the passage before us. Martin (1976: 65, following Collange), for example, argues that the apostle “is supplying a theological undergirding” for his troubled readers by alluding to God’s good work of creation, which will surely be brought to consummation. It is true that Paul’s language here is reminiscent of Gen. 1:2 LXX (συνετέλησεν ὁ θεὸς . . . τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ, God finished his work), that elsewhere Paul cites God’s creation of light as analogous to spiritual enlightenment (2 Cor. 4:6), and that the correspondence between creation and redemption is a fundamental biblical motif (Gnilka 1976: 46–47 in particular appeals to such passages as Isa. 41:4; 44:6; 48:12–13).

On the other hand, it should be noted that Gen. 2:2 speaks of God’s having already completed his work on the sixth day, and this lack of conceptual correspondence with Paul’s main point (future consummation) should weigh more heavily than linguistic correspondences. Moreover, the linguistic correspondence is only partial: even the word for “good” in the LXX, καλόν (kalon), is missing here. Why would Paul have used the synonym ἀγαθόν (agathon) if he meant to refer to the Genesis description of God's good work? Finally, Paul himself elsewhere uses the contrast between beginning and completing (see passages discussed below) with regard to the activity of believers. A deliberate allusion to Genesis, therefore, is at best possible, and then only in a secondary and indirect way (Fee 1995: 87n73 goes further and regards it as "irrelevant" and "far-fetched"). Even if we accept such an allusion, that fact would hardly exclude a reference to the Philippians' Christian activity, as the following discussion should make clear.

Paul uses the verb ἐπιτελέω (epiteleō, complete) six other times. One of those speaks of the need for "perfecting holiness in the fear of God" (2 Cor. 7:1), while four of them (Rom. 15:28; 2 Cor. 8:6, 11 [twice]) occur in the context of finishing the task of raising an offering for the saints in Jerusalem (see introduction, "Historical Context").^[7] A closer parallel thought is Gal. 3:3, which contains the only other occurrence of ἐνάρχομαι (enarchomai, begin) in Paul: "Having begun [enarxamenoi] by means of the Spirit, are you now finishing [epiteleisthe] by means of the flesh?" The Galatians as well as the Philippians had begun their life of faith not with their own strength but with God's through the Spirit. The Galatians were in terrible danger of perverting and thereby destroying that life (Gal. 5:5) by trying to bring it to perfection with the works of the flesh. The Philippians, while not in the same precarious position, also needed to hear that their growth in sanctification, already evident through their participation in the gospel, was really God's work, and he would not fail to bring it to perfection. (Cf. Janzen 1996, who relates the believer's completion of individual tasks to God's eschatological completion.)

No sooner has Paul made clear that God is the author of their salvation than he shifts his focus again in verse 7, where he commends them (not God) for their constancy in supporting Paul whatever the circumstances. Of course, God is the only grounds of our confidence, but the apostle claims no insight into God's secret counsel. His assurance that the Philippians will persevere to the end arises from the external, visible evidence that their lives provided.^[8]

The evidence is so clear, in fact, that it would have been wrong for Paul to doubt their future: καθὼς ἐστὶν δίκαιον ἔμοι τοῦτο φρονεῖν (kathōs estin dikaion emoi touto phronein, lit., even as it is right for me to think this). A similar expression occurs in 2 Thess. 1:3 (kathōs axion estin, as it is proper), but a more striking parallel is found in Heb. 6:9–10: in that passage the author, after considering the awesome possibility of destruction (v. 8), moves on to express his confidence (πεπέισμεθα, pepeismetha) in the genuineness of their salvation, a confidence based on previous evidence: “For God is not unjust [adikos] to forget your work [ergou].”

What Paul had expressed in verse 5 with the phrase tē koinōnia hymōn eis to euangelion takes a somewhat different form here in verse 7, συγκοινωνούς μου τῆς χάριτος (synkoinōnous mou tēs charitos, “partakers of grace with me,” or more likely “of my grace”; cf. Lohmeyer’s appeal to 4:14). What does this mean? The view that charis is yet one more reference to the Philippians’ gift, while superficially attractive, does not yield a good sense in this verse (Paul and the Philippians were not coparticipants in their gift to him). The prevailing opinion is that the word here refers to “the absolute grace of God” (Vincent); according to Martin (1976: 66) it “carries the meaning of God’s strength made available to his people in their weakness,” as in 2 Cor. 12:9 (cf. also O’Brien 1991: 70).

This interpretation has the advantage of taking the construction in a natural way and may therefore be correct, but I do not find it fully convincing. In the first place, Paul characteristically uses charis in reference to his apostolic ministry (Rom. 1:5; cf. also 12:3; 15:15; 1 Cor. 3:10; Gal. 2:9), and it is that ministry that the present verse has in view: “the defense and confirmation of the gospel.” Second, a general reference (“sharers in divine grace”) does not do justice to the parallel expression in verse 5, which also has in view Paul’s gospel ministry.^[9] Third, commentators have strangely ignored the clear parallel in 1 Cor. 9:23, “And I do all things on account of the gospel [euangelion], that I may become a partaker [synkoinōnos] of it.”

Without suggesting that charis = euangelion, we should recognize that the connection is very close; similarly, the meaning of synkoinōnos here approaches that of synergos (fellow-worker; cf. 4:3; 1 Thess. 3:2). The apostle has in view, therefore, not divine grace in general but the Philippians’ specific identification with, and support of, his gospel ministry. One must stress, however, that this ministry entails suffering (cf. the verb echaristhē in 1:29 and the linking of synkoinōneō with thlipsis, affliction, in 4:14).

But we should also note carefully how that ministry is defined: the qualification—“both in my chains and in the defense and confirmation of the gospel”—is of special importance in grasping the reason Paul values so highly the support of the Philippians. If we take ἀπολογία καὶ βεβαιώσει (apologia kai bebaiōsei) in the technical sense, “legal defense and proof,” then Paul would be referring to activity coordinate and linked with his imprisonment (so Hawthorne and many others; cf. Acts 25:16; 2 Tim. 4:16). But it seems much preferable to see a contrast between the two prepositional phrases, in which case the words in question (which, contra Vincent, may well constitute a hendiadys) would retain their general sense: “You have supported me not only during those times when I have been able to set forth openly the defense that confirms the gospel, but even during this period of confinement” (cf. Acts 22:1; 1 Cor. 9:3; 2 Cor. 7:11; 1 Pet. 3:15; see also Phil. 1:16). The Philippians, who had no way of knowing that this confinement had opened new avenues for the spread of the gospel (vv. 12–14), had shown their constancy and commitment to the apostolic ministry by supporting Paul even when, to the best of their knowledge, he was not “producing.”

Finally, we may note in this passage the intensity of Paul’s personal affection for the Philippian congregation. The apostle first introduces this emotional note at a point that jars the expected logical progression of the sentence: “I have good reason to be confident that God will preserve you, because I have you in my heart.” The awkwardness of this connection has led some to translate, “because you have me in your heart” (see the second additional note on 1:7). This move is unnecessary, however, for both sides of this mutual affection are explicit and prominent in the passage.

Verse 8 in particular reveals the depth of Paul’s feeling. Note, first, that this verse is an oath (“God is my witness”), something not altogether unusual for Paul (see Rom. 1:9; 2 Cor. 1:23; Gal. 1:20; and esp. 1 Thess. 2:5, 10, in an epistle that rivals Philippians in emotional intensity). Second, though the emphatic verb ἐπιποθέω (epipothēō, to long for) is elsewhere used by Paul with ἰδεῖν (idein, from horaō, to see) of his desire to see the recipients (Rom. 1:11; 1 Thess. 3:6; 2 Tim. 1:4), only here does he speak directly of longing for individuals (cf. 2:26 and 2 Cor. 9:14). Third, Paul uses the most expressive term available to indicate the source of human emotion, σπλάγχνα (splanchna, entrails; cf. 2:1; 2 Cor. 6:12; 7:15; Col. 3:12; and esp. Philem. 7, 12, 20), used here by metonymy of the affection itself; moreover, the use of that term with the qualifying genitive, “of Christ Jesus,” is unique to this passage (but cf. Philem. 20) and adds pathos to an already powerful statement.

C. Prayer (1:9–11)

The καί (kai, and) of verse 9 should probably be viewed as resumptive, picking up the reference to Paul's prayer in verse 4. As already pointed out (see the beginning of the previous section), Philippians and Colossians are characterized by a substantive intercessory prayer that follows immediately upon the thanksgiving. The similarities, however, go beyond matters of structure: some striking lexical correspondences are also present, as the following chart demonstrates.

| Philippians 1:9, 11 | Colossians 1:9–11 |
|---|---|
| proseuchomai I pray | proseuchomenoi praying |
| perisseuē en epignōsei abound in knowledge | auxanomenoi tē epignōsei tou theou growing in the knowledge of God |
| kai pasē aisthēsei and in all discernment | en pasē sophia kai synesei in all wisdom and understanding |
| peplērōmenoi being filled | plērōthēte you may be filled |
| karpon dikaiosynēs fruit of righteousness | karpophorountes bearing fruit |
| eis doxan kai epainon theou to the glory and praise of God | kata to kratos tēs doxēs autou according the power of his glory |
| ergon agathon (v. 6) a good work | en panti ergō agathō in every good work |

Distinctive of Colossians, in keeping with the primary concerns of that letter, is the abundance of cognitive terms. Distinctive of the prayer for the Philippians are the following elements.

Note first its literary effect. Paul achieves a stylistic crescendo by the logical progression of these verses. Already in verse 9 the words “still more and more” (ἔτι μᾶλλον καὶ μᾶλλον, eti mallon kai mallon) indicate something of the Philippians’ present yet partial enjoyment of the graces for which Paul prays on their behalf. The subsequent clauses express, with progressive significance, three goals that the apostle sets before his readers. What we may call the immediate purpose is expressed at the beginning of verse 10 by the words “so that you may test [or approve] the things that matter,” while the final purpose is the believer’s perfection: “in order that you may be pure and blameless for the day of Christ.”

But there is a third and higher purpose, for Paul’s ultimate goal focuses not on the believer but on “the glory and praise of God” (v. 11). We may notice here a fundamental correspondence with the Lord’s Prayer. By making the first petition the hallowing of God’s name, our Lord taught us to place every other request within the framework of our desire to glorify God. This pervasive biblical principle (cf. the prayers of Moses and Hezekiah, Exod. 32:11–13 and 2 Kings 19:15–19) finds clear expression in Paul’s theocentric view of the believer’s sanctification (cf. Ridderbos 1975: 258–65).

A second distinctive of the prayer consists in the interweaving of knowledge and love. While it is generally true—and certainly true in Colossians—that Paul’s use of cognitive terms has a direct ethical bearing, this aspect comes out explicitly in the prayer for the Philippians. We may already have an indication of it in Paul’s actual choice of terms at the end of verse 9, ἐν ἐπιγνώσει καὶ πάσῃ αἰσθήσει (en epignōsei kai pasē aisthēsei, in real knowledge and all discernment). Generally speaking, the English term knowledge has a broader reference than discernment insofar as the latter indicates the practical application of knowledge. The relation between the two Greek terms (i.e., semantic overlap as well as distinction) corresponds fairly closely to that of the English terms.

Is the combination of epignōsis and aisthēsis in this passage one more example of “stylistic reinforcement” (see introduction, “Language and Style”)? The term aisthēsis (also translated “insight, experience, perception”) occurs only here in the NT, and it seems unlikely that Paul would choose a term that had such a specific sense if the purpose were only stylistic. The cognate term αἰσθητήρια (aisthētēria) is used of the moral faculties or senses in Heb. 5:14, a conceptually parallel passage: “. . . solid food is for adults, who by practice have their faculties trained to discern [pros diakrisin] good and evil.” We have good reason, then, to believe that Paul chose aisthēsis to specify the practical outworkings of the knowledge in view.

Immediately following his use of this term Paul gives more explicit expression to the ethical concern: εἰς τὸ δοκιμάζειν ὑμᾶς τὰ διαφέροντα (eis to dokimazein hymas ta diapheronta, so that you may approve the things that matter; see additional note on 1:10). Paul uses this very phrase (dokimazeis ta diapheronta) in Rom. 2:18 with reference to the knowledge of a Jew who has been instructed in the law yet whose life is inconsistent. The sound judgment of which Paul speaks here, therefore, even though it is a step beyond mere knowledge of facts, might still fall short of Paul’s full desire for the Philippians. Yet the apostle has already precluded such an inadequate understanding by the initial statement of his prayer: “that your love may abound.”

The central focus of Paul’s concern is knowledge that cultivates love. This emphasis is surely to be related to the Philippians’ struggle over the problem of unity (see introduction, “Historical Context” and “Distinctive Teaching”), and it prepares the readers for the more forceful words in 2:1–4. For the moment we should note the ease with which Paul intertwines knowledge and love. The apostle cares not for any (false) knowledge that fails to issue in love. But it is just as important to reflect that Paul does not view love as mindless. Quite the contrary: knowledge is the way of love.

A third, and major, distinctive of the prayer in Philippians is its emphasis on moral perfection at Christ’s return. Paul’s ethical concerns reach full expression in the descriptive terms εἰλικρινεῖς (eilikrineis, sincere), ἀπόσκοποι (aproskopoi, lit., not stumbling), and πεπληρωμένοι καρπὸν δικαιοσύνης (peplērōmenoi karpon dikaiosynēs, filled with the fruit of righteousness). The first term, eilikrineis, is not used elsewhere by Paul, but the sense of moral purity is well established in extrabiblical literature (cf. also 2 Pet. 3:1).

The term aproskopoi is more controversial because it can be taken in either a passive or an active sense. The former (“not stumbling, not suffering damage”) leads to the common translation “blameless,” which is consonant with the sense of eilikrineis (cf. also Acts 24:16, ἀπόσκοπον συνείδησιν, aproskopon syneidēsēsin, a clear conscience). However, the only other occurrence of this adjective in Paul’s letters has the active sense, “not causing to stumble,” as in 1 Cor. 10:32, “Give no offense [aproskopoi ginesthe] to Jews or to Greeks or to the church of God” (cf. also proskomma in Rom. 14:13; 1 Cor. 8:9; proskopē in 2 Cor. 6:3). This latter meaning is consonant with Paul’s broader concern for unity among the Philippians and may be appropriate here (cf. Vincent and Hawthorne), though my subsequent comments regarding Christ’s return will tend to favor the passive sense. The matter cannot be resolved with certainty.

Also ambiguous is the phrase “fruit of righteousness.” The genitive dikaiosynēs can be understood as subjective (indicating origin: “fruit produced by righteousness”), as epexegetical (“fruit that is righteousness”), or as a Semitic-like genitive of quality (“righteous fruit”). Moreover, the word dikaiosynē itself may have a forensic force (justification = a legal judgment) or an ethical sense (righteous character or conduct).

In spite of these ambiguities, only two basic interpretations are likely. (1) If we take dikaiosynē in the forensic sense that is so characteristic of Paul, the genitive should be understood as subjective: “fruit that results from our justified state.”^[10] (2) If we choose the ethical meaning (cf. Rom. 6:13; 2 Cor. 6:7, 14; Eph. 5:9; several occurrences in the Pastorals), the genitive should probably be viewed as epexegetical, “the fruit that consists in right conduct” (note that there is virtually no difference between such a force and the genitive of quality, “righteous fruit”).

Can we decide between these two interpretations? Paul does not use this expression elsewhere (but cf. Heb. 12:11; James 3:18; and the commentaries). Other Pauline occurrences of karpos with the genitive are best interpreted as subjective genitives, but these are not decisive.^[11] A much better parallel is 2 Cor. 9:10, “the harvest of your righteousness” (τὰ γενήματα τῆς δικαιοσύνης ὑμῶν, ta genēmata tēs dikaiosynēs hymōn). Although the genitival construction here too is by itself ambiguous, one can hardly deny that Paul is alluding to Hos. 10:12 LXX, which clearly speaks of moral conduct.

The LXX, moreover, has other instances of karpos dikaiosynēs (Prov. 3:9; 11:30; Amos 6:12), in none of which a forensic notion seems to be present. These factors, combined with the specific context of Phil. 1:11, make an ethical interpretation almost certain. Furthermore, even if dikaiosynē here were interpreted as forensic, the ethical note would still be present in karpos: sanctification flowing out of justification. In short, whatever our understanding of the grammar, the fruit mentioned here must be described along the lines of the list in Gal. 5:22–23.

All told, it would appear that the object of Paul's prayer is the total sanctification of the Philippians; what they now have in part must be brought to full fruition εἰς ἡμέραν Χριστοῦ (eis hēmeran Christou). This phrase is best translated “for the day of Christ” (cf. Vincent). Rendering the preposition eis with “until” (so NASB and NIV, for example) might suggest that Paul is praying merely for a continuation of the sanctification the Philippians already enjoy, as though some Christians have arrived at their spiritual destination. Against such an inference we should note that it is not consonant with the emphasis Paul places on progression (“abound still more and more,” v. 9). Moreover, we have an important parallel within the context of this passage, namely, verse 6, which speaks of “the day of Jesus Christ” as the time of perfection (epitelesei; on the significance of achri, see the fourth additional note on 1:6).

An additional consideration is the thanksgiving in 1 Corinthians.^[12] Several lexical features in Philippians are shared by 1 Corinthians (e.g., pasē gnōsei in 1:5; bebaioō in 1:6, 8; koinōnia in 1:9; further, verse 7 contains a specific reference to Christ's return). Particularly important, however, is 1 Cor. 1:8: “who will also confirm you blameless to the end on the day of our Lord Jesus Christ.” The preposition “on” (Greek en) unambiguously expresses what is less clear in the eis of Phil. 1:10. That which Paul has in view, both in 1 Corinthians and in Philippians, is the sanctified state of his readers at the time of the Lord's return.

Now it is generally agreed that in the introductory sections of his epistles Paul often anticipates themes that he will develop in the body of the letter (cf. O'Brien 1991: 82–83). It is not far-fetched, for example, to see in 1 Cor. 1:4–9 a hint of Paul's concern with the perfectionism that was plaguing some of the Corinthian believers (cf. Bruce 1971: 20–21). Even more clearly, Philippians addresses this issue in 3:12, “Not that I have already obtained it, or have already become perfect, but I press on.” Not surprisingly, therefore, twice in his introduction (1:6, 10) Paul reminds the Philippians of the partial character of their sanctification. To be sure, believers may—no, must—be regarded as “pure and blameless” in this life, and thus Paul's prayer is in effect a commandment that the Philippians give evidence of their sanctification now. All the same, the apostle is focusing, as he did when writing to the Thessalonians, on the perfection of the sanctifying process, on his desire that God will sanctify them “completely” (holoteleis) and preserve them “without blame at [en] the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Thess. 5:23).

Additional Notes

1:1. Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ: The Majority text, accompanied by some versional and patristic evidence (see Tischendorf 1869–72: ad loc.) transposes the names to Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, an order that “predominates decidedly only in the Thessalonian Epistles” (Vincent).

1:1. πάντων: Lightfoot (on 1:4) speaks of the “studied repetition of the word ‘all’ in this epistle” (cf. 1:2, 4, 7 [two times], 8, 25; 2:17; 4:21) and finds it “impossible” not to link this fact with Paul’s emphasis on unity. Since Rom. 1:17 is the only other salutation that addresses the congregation in this fashion (1 Cor. 1:2 and 2 Cor. 1:1 are not exactly parallel), Lightfoot’s point seems reasonable.

1:1. ἁγίοις: Paul uses this word approximately forty times to describe Christians collectively, and because it occurs in most of the salutations, we need not look for any special significance in its use here. One should note, however, that this Pauline trait is hardly a trivial mannerism. Quite the contrary, it reflects in a striking way one of Paul’s most fundamental conceptions, the believer’s definitive sanctification (see the exegesis on 3:10).

1:1. σὺν ἐπισκόποις: The suggestion that these two Greek words should be read as one, “fellow-bishops,” can be traced back as early as Chrysostom (though this is disputed by Lightfoot 1868: 96n2); and his contemporary, Theodore of Mopsuestia, appears to reject it (see the helpful note in Swete 1880–82: 1.198–99). Metzger (1994: 544), who attributes this view to “dogmatic or ecclesiastical interests,” rejects it on two grounds: first, “the construction would be imperfect, the συν- having no appropriate reference” (but does not this remark beg the question at issue, namely, whether Paul regarded himself as an ἐπίσκοπος?);^[13] second, “the letter is obviously intended for the whole community” (but would the disputed reading necessarily exclude the church as a whole?). Although those two arguments appear inconclusive, Metzger and virtually all commentators are probably correct in rejecting this reading. Paul never calls himself an ἐπίσκοπος, so that the burden of proof would seem to rest on those who might see a self-reference in συν-. More important, σύν occurs in the salutations in 1–2 Corinthians, where its force is clearly “with.”

1:2. ἀπὸ θεοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν καὶ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ: Even though Vincent is correct in stressing the need “to distinguish between ideas which unconsciously underlie particular expressions, and the same ideas used with a definite conscious dogmatic purpose,” so that the conjoining of God and Christ here and elsewhere is not unequivocal proof that Paul believed in the deity of Christ—it would be unwise to ignore the ease and naturalness with which Paul appears to regard his Lord as on the same level with the Father. Vincent himself agrees that the expression “may be allowed to point to that doctrine which he elsewhere asserts.”

1:3. εὐχαριστῶ: Most commentators prefer to construe this verb with verse 5, in which case one needs to take verse 4 (or at least the second part of verse 4; cf. Lightfoot) as more or less parenthetical. This understanding, though defensible, creates a slight awkwardness, namely, the use of ἐπί in two different senses within the same grammatical construction (i.e., two prepositional phrases ruled by the same verb). It appears more natural to take verses 3–4a (up to ὑμῶν) as the main clause, with verses 4b–5 as a subordinate, participial clause. Meyer (on v. 5) objects that in this case “the specification of the ground for thanks would be entirely wanting,” but this comment overlooks how easy it is for Paul to shift or readjust his thought in the middle of a sentence. In other words, a desire to bring in the note of joy leads Paul to a reiteration of the initial thought of thanksgiving, only that now (at the end of v. 4—see additional notes on that verse) he uses the broader notion expressed by δέησις.

1:3. The addition of ἐγὼ μὲν (preceding εὐχαριστῶ) by the “Western” tradition led some older scholars to draw the inference that Paul had just received a communication from the Philippians in which they apologized for the smallness of their gift. Paul’s response is, “As for me, I am most thankful.” For an extensive discussion of this variant, see especially Greijdanus 1937: 67–69.

1:3. ἐπὶ πάσῃ τῇ μνεΐᾳ ὑμῶν (lit., in all the [i.e., my] remembrance of you): It has been suggested that this construction is a subjective genitive, yielding the translation, “for all your remembrance [of me].” The suggestion is most intriguing and is supported by the immediate context, where Paul has in view the Philippians’ concern for him (cf. also 4:10). If so, it would mean that ἐπί is used in the same causal sense both times (vv. 3 and 5) and that the two prepositional clauses are parallel and interpret each other.

In spite of its attractiveness, however, this interpretation conflicts with the broader context of Paul’s epistolary style. Paul uses μνεΐα in the thanksgivings of Romans, 1 Thessalonians (also the verb μνημονεύω), Philemon, and 2 Timothy; in all of those cases, the reference is to Paul’s remembrance of his addressees. Given the somewhat formal and stereotyped character of those opening sections, it seems much preferable to take the Philippians construction as an objective genitive.

Moreover, ἐπί is used “temporally” in the parallel passages in Romans, 1 Thessalonians, and Philemon. It is true that in those passages the construction is different (ἐπὶ τῶν προσευχῶν), but we should keep in mind that in this kind of context μνεΐα and προσευχή seem to occupy the same semantic field, and BDAG 654 (meaning 2) prefers the meaning “mention” for μνεΐα here (though Lightfoot argues cogently that this meaning should be reserved for instances in which the noun is coupled with ποιέομαι). Notice further the suggestive parallel phrase ἐπὶ πάσῃ τῇ θλίψει ἡμῶν in 2 Cor. 1:4 and 1 Thess. 3:7. The NIV is probably correct in translating, “every time I remember you.”^[14]

1:4. ὑπὲρ πάντων ὑμῶν: In the parallel passages Paul uses the preposition περί. The use of ὑπὲρ for περί is not unusual in Paul (BDF §231.1), but could its presence here be explained by its proximity to δεήσει (even if the sense “petition” is not prominent in this passage)? If so, ὑπὲρ πάντων ὑμῶν should be connected with what immediately precedes and only indirectly with εὐχαριστῶ (contra Lightfoot). On the significance of πάντων, see the second additional note on 1:1.

1:4. μετὰ χαρᾶς τὴν δέησιν ποιούμενος: the article τὴν would seem to indicate a reference to the previously mentioned δεήσει, and this factor suggests strongly that μετὰ χαρᾶς begins a new clause (contra NASB) and is emphatic.

1:4. The word δέησις may be used in the broad sense of “prayer” as a synonym for προσευχή (cf. also εὐχή) or in a narrow sense as a synonym of αἴτημα (request; cf. also ἱκετηρία, supplication, in Heb. 5:7). In the second sense it contrasts with εὐχαριστία (thanksgiving), and this factor has led most commentators to deny that the beginning of verse 5 (= the ground of thanksgiving) should be construed with δέησιν ποιούμενος. Such a construction, however, seems preferable because of the likelihood that δέησις is being used in its more general sense, in which case the semantic contrast with εὐχαριστία is neutralized—indeed, the notion of “thanksgiving” is thereby included in that of “prayer.” (Does not the emphasis on joy seem more easily associated with the idea of thanksgiving than with that of petition?)^[15] Note that ἔντευξις, which normally means “petition,” seems to be used of thanksgiving in 1 Tim. 4:5 (cf. BDAG 340 [2.c]).

1:5. ἐπί (here “because, in view of”): This preposition is used to express the grounds of thanksgiving only in this verse and in 1 Cor. 1:4; normally Paul uses a causal participle (Col. 1:4; 1 Thess. 1:3; Philem. 5) or ὅτι (Rom. 1:8; 1 Cor. 1:5 [?]; 2 Thess. 1:3).

1:5. τῆς πρώτης ἡμέρας: This phrase corresponds to ἐν ἀρχῇ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου (lit., in the beginning of the gospel, Phil. 4:15). Lightfoot points out that the article τῆς, omitted by most manuscripts, is unnecessary with numerals; however, its attestation (see NA²⁷) is early and strong.

1:6. πεποιθώς: The position is emphatic as common with Paul. Schenk (1984: 92) takes his structural approach to an extreme when he views this participle as synonymous (“Kontextidentisch”) with προσεύχομαι in verse 9.

1:6. αὐτὸ τοῦτο: Appealing to 2 Pet. 1:5, Meyer argues for an adverbial use here, referring to the previous verse rather than to what follows. We may paraphrase: “being persuaded, for this very reason [viz., your constancy], that God will preserve you.” This construction would fit nicely with the exposition above; moreover, it could be supported with appeal to τοῦτο αὐτό in 2 Cor. 2:3 (cf. BDAG 153, s.v. αὐτός, meaning 1.g, end of paragraph; but see NASB). Lightfoot dismisses this idea on the basis of word order and most commentators follow him; indeed, the use of αὐτὸ τοῦτο elsewhere in Paul (2 Cor. 7:11; Gal. 2:10; and several instances of εἰς αὐτὸ τοῦτο) does not support an adverbial force here. The matter cannot be solved conclusively (Phil. 1:25 does not really help us); Meyer’s construction should be regarded as plausible but not probable. (Cf. also Ewald 1923: 53.)

1:6. ἐν ὑμῖν (lit., in you): This construction often means “among you, in your midst,” a rendering preferred by Martin (1976: 65). Meyer objects that the ὑπὲρ πάντων ὑμῶν of verse 7 suggests that Paul is expressing “a confidence felt in respect to all individuals.” This passage alone does not help us resolve the ambiguity, though the parallel in 2:13 (see my comments there) strongly supports Meyer.

1:6. ἄχρι ἡμέρας Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ: The literal NASB rendering, “until the day of Christ Jesus,” is awkward, for the English speaker anticipates “at”; NIV preserves “until” and smooths out the sentence by rendering the verb ἐπιτελέσει, “will carry it on to completion,” possibly the best solution (the NEB uses the preposition “by”). See further the comments on verse 10.

1:6. Many important witnesses have the transposition Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, but the reading adopted in NA²⁷ is extremely early (℣⁴⁶) and has wide geographic attestation (B D lat); it also fits the pattern of the later epistles (see the first additional note on 1:1). In spite of Sinaiticus, even Tischendorf (1869–72: ad loc.) adopts this text.

1:7. φρονεῖν: On the significance of this word see the introduction, “Distinctive Teaching.”

1:7. διὰ τὸ ἔχειν με ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ ὑμῶς (because I have you in my [lit., the] heart): Some commentators have suggested taking με as object and ὑμῶς as subject: “because you have me in your heart.” This rendering yields a smoother connection with the first part of the verse; that is, the Philippians’ love and care for Paul is the reason (διὰ) he is justified to feel confident. In fact, however, we may see the reason as resting “not on the act of remembering but on the thing remembered” (Lightfoot; no one would want to argue on the basis of Rom. 6:17 that Paul was thankful that the Romans had been servants of sin—such grammatically imprecise constructions are natural and common).

Since Meyer’s time, moreover, virtually all commentators have argued that the accusative closest to the infinitive is normally to be taken as subject; usually, no evidence is given, and Winer (1882: 414n) emphasizes that only the context can be decisive, but we may note the evidence of 2 Cor. 2:13; 8:6. [16] (In his summary of the evidence Hawthorne does not mention these two important verses because he limited his research to phrases where the preposition διὰ occurs. As for the occurrences he lists, his analysis of them seems to me to need sharper focus.) Of particular importance is the fact that Chrysostom, a Greek speaker himself who often weighs alternate positions (see introduction, “Exegetical History”), takes με as subject and shows no awareness of the alternate possibility (similarly Theodore).

1:7. συγκαινωνοὺς . . . ὄντας (lit., being fellow-sharers): The participle is probably causal (cf. NASB: “since”; NIV: “for”), though Lenski (1937: 713) prefers to take the participial construction as in apposition (“you all as being my joint-fellowshippers”). The difference is minimal. Bockmuehl (1998: 63) indicates that I construe μου with τῆς χάριτος, but that is apparently a misinterpretation of my paraphrase above.

1:8. μου: manuscripts containing a “Western” text, supported by a few other witnesses, have the dative μοι (cf. Old Latin and Vulgate mihi). Curiously, ℣⁴⁶ and one Old Latin manuscript (a, which belongs to the 9th cent.) omit the pronoun; if the omission is original, it would account for the variation, but accidental omissions in ℣⁴⁶ are not uncommon (see introduction, “Textual History”). The addition of ἐστίν in the Majority text is certainly a secondary smoothing of the text.

1:9. καὶ τοῦτο προσεύχομαι: We may relate the prayer to what immediately precedes: “I long to see you, but since I am prevented by my chains, I will minister to you through prayer” (cf. Martin 1976: 68). Alternatively, as suggested in the exposition above, we may understand it as a resumption of verse 4: “I said that I was making prayer for you; here is what I have been praying.” These two ideas, of course, are not mutually exclusive.

1:9. περισσεύη: This present subjunctive is consonant with the progressive element in the sentence (“more and more,” though it would be an overstatement to say that the tense itself emphasizes that element), and this factor has persuaded most critics that the variant aorist reading (περισσεύση, supported by few manuscripts, including B) is a corruption. Possibly so, but Greek writers do not always use tenses as we might expect, and it is difficult to explain how an aorist might have arisen if the present is original. This variation, contrary to what is often thought, does not involve a substantive difference. We should incidentally note that this verb, as Hawthorne rightly emphasizes, is characteristically Pauline and draws attention to the abundance of “the new age opened up by Christ.”

1:9. ἐπιγνώσει: It is very difficult to come up with an adequate English equivalent for this term if we wish to distinguish it from the simple form γνῶσις, “knowledge.” The NASB rendering, “real knowledge,” tends to overload the Greek compound.^[17] It should be noted that Paul uses γνῶσις fifteen times in the Corinthian correspondence, three times in Romans, four times in the Prison and Pastoral Epistles; in contrast, ἐπίγνωσις does not occur in 1–2 Corinthians at all, occurs three times in Romans, twelve times in the Prison and Pastoral Epistles. Assuming a traditional view of the chronology of the epistles, one could reasonably argue that Paul simply developed a preference for the compounded term and that this factor (not some substantive semantic difference between it and γνῶσις) accounts for its use here.

1:10. δοκιμάζειν . . . διαφέροντα: Both of the terms are polysemous and so four translations are possible—“test/approve the things that differ,” “test/approve the things that are excellent.”^[18] “Approve what is best” is doubtless the correct idea here (similarly Rom. 2:18), though one must note that these terms were common in Hellenistic times, particularly in Stoic circles: Epictetus uses δοκιμάζω with φαντασία when expounding on our God-given ability to test external impressions (e.g., Disc. 1.20.7), whereas διαφέρω is especially common, and the derivative ἀδιάφορα (things indifferent) is contrasted to both the good and the bad (e.g., 1.20.12). The early fathers tended to see in Paul’s statement a concern that believers be able to distinguish heresy. Johnstone, interestingly, sees here not a reference to the contrast between virtue and vice but to “the faculty of distinguishing Christian virtue from all counterfeits; of seeing, in an apparent conflict of duties, what present duty really is; . . . of avoiding moral pitfalls, however carefully covered over” (1875: 42).

1:11. εἰς δόξαν καὶ ἔπαινον θεοῦ (to the glory and praise of God): One of the most striking variants of \mathfrak{P}^{46} is found here, εἰς δόξαν θεοῦ καὶ ἔπαινον ἐμοί, “to the glory of God and my praise.” Metzger (1994: 544), who describes this variant as “astonishing,” considers it an early conflation of the original reading with the reading of F and G, “to my glory and praise” (supported by the Latin manuscript g and by Ambrosiaster). Ross (1983: 70) agrees that \mathfrak{P}^{46} gives us a conflated reading, but he argues that F and G preserve the original because it easily explains the other variants: “At first sight it would seem outrageous that Paul should make so egotistical a remark, so scribes would naturally alter the offensive ἐμοί.”

Ross is quite right in stressing the difficulty, and therefore possible originality, of this reading and in pointing to 2 Cor. 1:14 and Phil. 2:16 as evidence that the concept may be compatible with Paul’s thought (see also 1 Thess. 2:19 and my comments on Phil. 2:16). It is too much to suggest, however, that Paul could have used the theologically charged term δόξα in this particular construction; that is, although the term by itself may be used of human beings (e.g., 1 Thess. 2:20), the reading of F and G would constitute a doxology ascribed to Paul.

On the other hand, the term ἔπαινον is quite naturally applied to human beings, as in Rom. 2:29; we should note in particular the construction in 1 Pet. 2:14, εἰς . . . ἔπαινον . . . ἀγαθοποιῶν

(for the praise of those who do right). Indeed, there is much to be said for the originality of the reading of P^{46} , which is perhaps reflected in Latin manuscript a (= D in WW: in gloriam mihi et laudem Dei, to my glory and God's praise). If so, then the omission of $\theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon$ in F and G could be explained either as accidental or as a desire to avoid such a close juxtaposition of God and Paul. In short, the reading of P^{46} accounts most easily for the history of the text, but one hesitates to adopt such a jarring variant when it is found in this lone witness.

- I. Opening (1:1–11)
- II. Paul's Missionary Report (1:12–26)
- III. A Call to Sanctification (1:27–2:30)
- IV. Doctrinal Polemics (3:1–4:1)
- V. Final Concerns (4:2–23)

II. Paul's Missionary Report (1:12–26)

We noticed in the previous chapter that the introductory section of Philippians, and particularly its intercessory prayer, contains certain traits that distinguish this letter from the other Pauline Epistles. With 1:12 the apostle moves into the body of the letter,^[1] and here again we meet a feature distinctive of Philippians, namely, a detailed account of Paul's current circumstances (see introduction, "Literary Structure").

In his other epistles, Paul covers this topic toward the end of the body, in connection with a so-called travelogue (see comments on 2:19–30). And even though 2 Cor. 1:8–11 parallels closely what we find in Philippians, the differences are important. First, in sharp contrast to the tone of the Corinthians passage, where Paul informs the readers of his grave difficulties ("we despaired even of life"), here the apostle immediately reassures the Philippians that, whatever they may have heard, his imprisonment has actually brought great blessing and joy. Second, the Philippians account is characterized by much more detail (somewhat comparable in this respect is Rom. 15:22–32), including both a description of Paul's circumstances (vv. 12–17) and a moving expression of his attitude toward the Philippian believers (vv. 18–26).

How do we explain the prominence that this matter receives in Philippians? Part of the answer is surely the mutual affection enjoyed by the apostle and this congregation. The saints in Philippi must have communicated to Paul their deep concern for his welfare (cf. 4:10), and the first item on his agenda is to put them at ease; not surprisingly, he returns to this topic at the very end of the letter (4:11, 13, 18). One must also view this passage specifically as a response to the Philippians' gift. The Philippians are in effect supporting Paul and they have a "right" to find out about his affairs; thus the apostle assures them that their effort is not wasted.

Modern readers may find these comments offensive. Does it not spoil the passage to bring in finances? Was not the love between Paul and the Philippians above such mundane considerations? Is it not out of character for Paul to play the part of a public relations man? These questions, I suspect, reflect false dichotomies: love versus material support; the first century versus our times; the apostles versus “normal” Christians. It is, of course, true that Paul’s love for the Philippians would not have flagged if they had been unable to contribute. It is also true that in certain situations (e.g., 1 Cor. 9:1–8; 1 Thess. 2:9) Paul did not accept contributions and that even here in this letter (4:10–11) one detects a note of embarrassment over the Philippians’ gift.

But these considerations should not prevent us from recognizing the importance that the apostle attached to such gifts as an expression of his converts’ commitment to the gospel (see comment on 4:18). Moreover, all the cultural differences that separate us from the early church do not make void those fundamental traits that we have in common with them—the apostle, no less than modern missionaries, had to eat. Indeed, contemporary missionary letters look very much like Phil. 1:12–26. We make a very important exegetical point when we refer to this passage as Paul’s missionary report.

II. Paul's Missionary Report (1:12–26)

➤ A. Paul's Circumstances (1:12–17)

B. Paul's Attitude (1:18–26)

A. Paul's Circumstances (1:12–17)

As I have already stressed, Paul wishes in this section to reassure the Philippians that his imprisonment has not suppressed the work of the gospel; indeed, the words προκοπήν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου (prokopēn tou euangeliou, progress of the gospel, v. 12) sound the keynote of the whole passage. Paul offers two pieces of evidence in support of his claim: the praetorian guard itself has become exposed to the Christian faith (v. 13), and other Christians have received encouragement to preach boldly (v. 14). Paul, however, does not overlook the reality of adversity, and so verses 15–17 introduce a sour note by informing the Philippians (or confirming to them?) that the apostle has enemies who wish to bring affliction upon him. The paragraph may thus be outlined as follows:

1. The unfettered progress of the gospel (1:12–14)
2. Blessing mixed with adversity (1:15–17)

Exegesis and Exposition

¹²Now I want you to know, brothers, that my adversities [instead of damaging the faith as you fear] have rather turned out for the advance of the gospel. ¹³In the first place, all the members of the palace guard—and even the rest of the people here—have become aware that I bear my chains by virtue of my union with Christ. ¹⁴Moreover, the majority of the brothers, having gained confidence in the Lord as a result of my chains, are becoming exceedingly bold to speak the word “of God” without fear.

¹⁵It is true [as you have heard] that some are preaching Christ motivated by envy and strife, but there are also those who do it motivated by goodwill. ¹⁶“The latter do it out of love, knowing that I am divinely appointed to defend the gospel,” ¹⁷while others preach Christ out of partisanship, with impure motives, supposing that they will “add” pressure to my chains.

1. The Unfettered Progress of the Gospel (1:12–14)

The introductory formula “Now I want you to know, brothers” (v. 12; see the first additional note) calls the reader’s special attention to the importance of what follows: though Paul may be in chains, “the word of God is not imprisoned” (2 Tim. 2:9). In this respect, though not in others, Paul’s circumstances during his next (and final) imprisonment were to prove comparable: “The Lord stood by me and strengthened me, in order that through me the proclamation might be fulfilled and that all the Gentiles might hear it” (2 Tim. 4:17, and cf. comments below on 1:25).

The apostle, however, did not merely say that the gospel had continued to make progress in spite of adversity; rather, the adversity itself had turned out for the advancement of the gospel. Far from trying to evoke sympathy from his readers by expressing resignation, the apostle went out of his way to make sure that the Philippians did not grow overly concerned about him; indeed, he gave a glowing report of his ministry intended to produce joy in their hearts (v. 18). One should note, moreover, that implicit in this statement is a recognition of God’s sovereign workings in human affairs, though the point may seem veiled by the impersonal ἐλήλυθεν (elēlythen, “come about”). Paul stressed the ironic turn of events: some may have intended to curtail his ministry with chains, but, in fact, his imprisonment had led both to the evangelization of pagans (v. 13) and to the edification of believers (leading in turn to even greater evangelism, v. 14). We must focus on those two items, because they constitute the evidence set forth by the apostle to demonstrate his claim.

First, the imprisonment had made it possible for the whole praetorian guard, and others, to be exposed to the faith. Paul expresses this thought in a peculiar way, ὥστε τοὺς δεσμούς μου φανεροὺς ἐν Χριστῷ γενέσθαι (hōste tous desmous mou phaneroous en Christō genesthai). The clause may be rendered “so that my chains in Christ have become manifest” (construing tous desmous mou with en Christō), meaning “so that my imprisonment in the cause of Christ has become well known” (cf. NASB). Paul’s style, however, would not lead us to expect the predicate adjective phaneroous separating two syntactically linked phrases. Generally, commentators agree on the construction “so that my chains have become manifest in Christ”—a compressed and unusual expression meaning “it has become clear . . . that I am in chains for Christ” (NIV). We may further ask why Paul did not express his thought with what may be considered a more predictable phrase, hyper Christou (for the sake of Christ). The use of en Christō here reflects in a notable way Paul's conception of solidarity with Christ. We should see in this choice not a careless overuse of the phrase but Paul's recognition that he is sharing in Christ's sufferings (see comments on 3:10).

Second, Paul rejoiced because his imprisonment, instead of intimidating the other Christians in Rome, had actually encouraged most of them to become bolder witnesses. Here again the construction is ambiguous, but in this case commentators are divided, and their discussions (cf. Meyer and Vincent especially) seem unnecessarily confusing. The basic question is whether ἐν κυρίῳ (en kyriō, in the Lord) should be construed with τῶν ἀδελφῶν (tōn adelphōn, the brothers) or with πεποιθότας (pepoithotas, trusting). If we choose the former, we could translate with Alford (1871–75: 3.158–59): “. . . most of the brethren in the Lord, encouraged by (having confidence in) my bonds, are venturing more abundantly (than before) to speak the word of God” (cf. also NIV). If the latter: “Most of the brethren, trusting in the Lord because of my imprisonment, have far more courage to speak the word of God” (NASB). The arguments advanced for either interpretation are not decisive (see the first additional note on 1:14), but the use of pepoitha en kyriō later in this epistle and elsewhere in Paul barely tips the scales in favor of the second interpretation (see Rom. 14:14; Gal. 5:10; Phil. 2:24; 3:3, 4; 2 Thess. 3:14).

An interesting question raised in our day by verse 14 is whether the preaching of the gospel is the responsibility of Christians generally or of ordained church officers only. Verses 15–17 (see comments below) suggest that Paul has in view recognized church leaders rather than believers generally. On the other hand, “most of the brothers” in verse 14 cannot reasonably be restricted to ministers. This verse was of course not written for the purpose of answering the question we are posing, and surely it would be a grave mistake to downplay the necessity for and distinctiveness of church offices. Nevertheless, Phil. 1:14 leaves little doubt that Paul encouraged believers in general “to speak the word of God without fear.”

2. Blessing Mixed with Adversity (1:15–17)

The connection between these verses and those that precede is expressed by the conjunction kai (usually “and”) at the beginning of verse 15. But what is its force? Some commentators interpret the conjunction as an adversative and draw a sharp distinction between the “brothers” of verse 14 and the group mentioned in verse 15a. There is some force to Vincent's argument that “the motives of envy and strife [in vv. 15–17] . . . cannot be reconciled with” Paul’s description in verse 14, “trusting the Lord because of my imprisonment” (the latter phrase indicates good motives). The answer to this problem is not a sharp artificial separation between verses 14 and 15a but the simple recognition that Paul’s syntax is not always subject to precise logical analysis (see introduction, “Language and Style”). The flourishing evangelism referred to in verse 14 surely includes the preaching/proclamation of Christ mentioned in verses 15a and 17; moreover, the term ἀδελφοί (adelphoi, brothers) is applicable to Paul’s opponents. But it is also true that the particular terms of description in verse 14 reflect Paul’s estimate only of those who preach from goodwill—clearly they are not terms the apostle would have chosen as an adequate description of his opponents.

We may therefore view kai as having a transitional but emphatic force. This idea is captured well by both the NIV (“It is true that”) and the NASB (“to be sure”), and one is tempted to supply, “as you have heard.” The reference in verse 14 to renewed evangelistic activity among believers led Paul naturally to acknowledge a painful situation that had very likely come to the Philippians’ attention: not all who were taking part in this activity did so impelled by pure motives.

Of course, Paul did not ignore those whose work arose from goodwill and love. Those believers had been emboldened to speak the word because of their recognition that Paul was divinely commissioned. The last word in verse 16, κείμεναι (keimai, lit., lie, recline), is often used in the sense “appointed” and can be translated “destined” (see esp. Luke 2:34 and 1 Thess. 3:3). The predestinarian motif in Paul’s description of his own call is particularly vivid in Gal. 1:15–16, where the divine activity is emphasized repeatedly: “He who set me apart [aphorizō] from my mother’s womb and called me [kaleō] by his grace [charis] was pleased [eudokeō] to reveal [apokalyptō] his Son in me, in order that I might preach him among the Gentiles” (it is generally recognized that Jeremiah’s call provides the pattern for this description; see Jer. 1:5).

But Paul’s description of the sincere Christian workers takes secondary importance. In chiasmic fashion (see additional note on 1:16–17) Paul begins and ends this paragraph with what was uppermost in his mind: the brothers whose preaching arose from a heart of strife. These individuals were actuated by impure motives (οὐχ ἁγνῶς, ouch hagnōs): they merely pretended (πρόφασις, prophasis, v. 18) to be concerned for the gospel when their real desire was to aggravate Paul's sufferings. The last clause of verse 17, οἰόμενοι θλίψιν ἐγείρειν τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου (oiomenoi thlipsin egeirein tois desmois mou), is best translated literally, "supposing that they will add pressure to my chains," a rendering that preserves Paul's play on words (see the second additional note on 1:17).

The apostle's meaning is clear enough; what is not at all plain is why his opponents would think that their preaching created grief for him. In other words, if their real motivation was to mortify Paul, why would they go about it in such a way—proclaiming Christ? How one answers this question depends on one's prior identification of these opponents (see introduction, "Paul's Opponents"). For Lightfoot, who identified them as Judaizers, these individuals "sought to annoy and wound" the apostle by forming "a compact party in the Church bound to the observance of the law." Most expositors, however, prefer to see no doctrinal question involved at all and attribute the opponents' behavior to "personal animosity and rivalry."^[1] This latter alternative fails to provide an adequate answer to our question. Indeed, would it really occur to anyone that one way of hurting the apostle was to preach precisely what Paul himself had been preaching, especially when such an activity would brand them as "Pauline" and thus expose them to danger as well?

Although Lightfoot was almost surely wrong in his description of the opponents, he perceived correctly that some issues of doctrinal significance must have been at stake. Without necessarily preaching heresy such as we read about in Galatians, these individuals opposed the more distinctive features of Paul's gospel and sought to undermine his ministry to the Gentiles. Yes, men and women were being brought to a saving knowledge of Christ, and for that Paul rejoiced. But this evangelistic success was being used by some to subvert the apostle's authority and to establish a form of Gentile Christianity that was friendlier to Judaizing influences. It is no wonder they believed their efforts would add misery to Paul's sufferings (see now Fee 1995: 122n29; Bockmuehl 1998: 77–78).

Additional Notes

1:12. γινώσκειν δὲ ὑμᾶς βούλομαι, ἀδελφοί: This formula occurs with some variation in a large number of Pauline passages, particularly for the purpose of introducing a new section (with either δέ or γάρ): θέλω ὑμᾶς εἰδέναι; γνωρίζω(-ομεν) ὑμῖν, ἀδελφοί; and οὐ θέλω(-ομεν) ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν, ἀδελφοί (Rom. 1:13; 11:25; 1 Cor. 10:1; 12:1; 11:3; 2 Cor. 1:8; Col. 2:1; 1 Thess. 4:13). Although Hawthorne states that the particular formula used here does not occur elsewhere in Paul “at this particular point of transition,” in at least two passages (2 Cor. 1:8 and Gal. 1:11; perhaps also Rom. 1:13) the expression does serve to introduce the body of the letter; 2 Cor. 1:8 is a particularly close parallel.

1:12. τὰ κατ’ ἐμέ (my circumstances): This expression is used by Paul in two other places (Eph. 6:21; Col. 4:7), both of them also against the background of his imprisonment; notice similarly Acts 24:22 and 25:14 with reference to judicial proceedings.

1:12. ἐλήλυθεν: For the meaning “turn out,” BDAG 395 (meaning 5) refers to Wis. 15:5: the sight of idols ἄφροσιν εἰς ὄρεξιν ἔρχεται (for fools results in lust; see Goodrich 1913: viii note, 310).

1:13. ὥστε: It would be pedantic to understand this conjunction as introducing an additional result (that is, the imprisonment resulted in the progress of the gospel and this in turn resulted in the events described in v. 13); rather, the conjunction should be regarded as epexegetical, explaining the previous clause. This conjunction then rules two infinitival clauses, one in verse 13 and the other in verse 14, each of which explains in what way the gospel has advanced.

1:13. ἐν ὧ τῷ πραιτωρίῳ: Though in some respects dated, Lightfoot’s excursus on this point (99–104) is still valuable. Assuming a Roman imprisonment, he argues that the most suitable meaning of praetorium in this passage is “a body of men” rather than a place. A brief but also very clear and useful discussion may be found in Bruce (1983: xxii–xxiii). He points out that there is no evidence the term was used “for the headquarters of a proconsul in a senatorial province such as Asia was at this time” (thus an Ephesian imprisonment as the setting for Philippians seems unlikely). The headquarters of the governor of Judea could indeed be called a praetorium (Mark 15:16; Acts 23:35), but Bruce (1983: xxiii) considers that Caesarea, a political backwater, “offers too restricted a setting” for Paul’s comments here. Lightfoot and Bruce (1983: 17) are probably correct that Paul is referring to the emperor’s bodyguard in Rome. (For a different view see Hawthorne and the bibliography he provides.)

1:14. τοὺς πλείονας τῶν ἀδελφῶν ἐν κυρίῳ πεποιθότας (most of the brothers, trusting in the Lord): In favor of this translation is the fact that to construe τῶν ἀδελφῶν with ἐν κυρίῳ (the brothers in the Lord) results in an expression that occurs nowhere else and that some commentators regard as redundant (cf. Vincent, Hawthorne, and esp. Schenk 1984: 135); this objection is not decisive, however, because one could also speak of ἅγιοι ἐν Χριστῷ (v. 1) as redundant. Those who prefer to translate “the brothers in the Lord” point out that πεποιθώς normally occurs first in its clause; however, Lightfoot argues plausibly that in 1:14 ἐν κυρίῳ stands first for emphasis (but see Lohmeyer). It appears then that these various arguments and objections cancel out each other. As pointed out in the comments above, Paul’s apparent preference for using the verb πέποιθα with the preposition ἐν argues for construing ἐν κυρίῳ with πεποιθότας here, as the NASB translates.

1:14. τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου: Whether we take this dative as causal (cf. NIV and NASB) or as instrumental (“by, through”; cf. Vincent) makes no substantive difference.

1:14. τὸν λόγον: Manuscripts F and G add τοῦ κυρίου, whereas the Alexandrian manuscripts, followed by NIV and NASB, add τοῦ θεοῦ. The committee for UBS⁴ chose the reading of Ɱ⁴⁶ (also the Majority text, but with weak early support), which is simply τὸν λόγον, on the principle that the shorter reading is preferable. (Metzger 1994: 545 comments that the other readings “have the appearance of scribal expansions.”) However, Ɱ⁴⁶ is characterized by many careless omissions (see introduction, “Textual History”), so the question must remain open, as I have tried to indicate with brackets in my translation.

1:15. διὰ φθόνον καὶ ἔριν (from envy and strife): In verse 17 Paul uses a different preposition and a different noun (ἐξ ἐριθείας) but it would be a mistake to stress these differences. It may be that the preposition ἐκ more clearly than διὰ calls attention to attitudes as sources of behavior, but it is just as possible that the variation is purely stylistic and that the semantic distinction between the two prepositions is neutralized in this context. Similarly, it seems best not to look for subtle distinctions between the nouns, even though different English equivalents may indeed be necessary in different contexts. One should also note that, in spite of their phonetic similarity, ἔρις and ἐριθεία are not etymologically related (see Chantraine 1968–80: 371–72); yet it seems clear that popular etymologizing tended to link them (cf. Lightfoot). Therefore, ἐριθεία may be translated “strife” or “partisanship” rather than “selfish ambition” (the latter is preferred by NIV and NASB).

1:15. δι’ εὐδοκίαν (lit., on account of goodwill): In verse 16 we have “out of love” (ἐξ ἀγάπης). Perhaps εὐδοκία was used first because it provides a clear contrast to the selfish motivation expressed by φθόνος and ἔρις; then, for stylistic reasons, Paul avoided the repetition of εὐδοκία and made use of a word that had become indicative of distinctly Christian ideals. Schenk (1984: 140) considers the words contextual synonyms. The view that εὐδοκία here means “divine approval” (O’Brien 1991: 100; Bockmuehl 1998: 78–79) seems alien to the context.

1:16–17. The Textus Receptus, represented in English by KJV, transposes these two verses, so that the structure of the clauses becomes parallel (AB-AB) rather than chiasmic (AB-BA). This textual variant, though found in a majority of (late) manuscripts, is not attested earlier than the sixth century; indeed, its attestation is so poor that it is not even mentioned in UBS⁴. The variant is a convincing example of the tendency (common in the Byzantine or Majority text) to smooth what may have appeared stylistically awkward to some scribes.

1:17. ἐγείρειν (to raise, cause): The Majority reading is the synonym ἐπιφέρειν (to bring, inflict on), which has very poor attestation.

1:17. οἰόμενοι θλίψιν ἐγείρειν τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου (supposing that they will add pressure to my chains): If we take δεσμοῖς as an instrumental dative, we could translate, “meaning to make use of my imprisonment to stir up fresh trouble” (so NEB mg.), but this construction, which seems to import an alien meaning into the text, is rightly ignored by commentators. A satisfactory translation must, first of all, do justice to the contrast between εἰδότες (knowing, v. 16) and οἰόμενοι (imagining; Collange’s “imagining rightly” in effect does away with the contrast). Second, we should note (with Lightfoot) that Paul here revives the dead metaphor θλίψις (friction, pressure → oppression, affliction) by combining it with δεσμός (chain → imprisonment, by metonymy), a stylistic element missed altogether by most versions. Third, ἐγείρειν, too, is being used figuratively.^[2] Though not all of these features can be reproduced, the English reader can easily understand the basic figure of the Greek with a literal translation, as above.

II. Paul's Missionary Report (1:12–26)

A. Paul's Circumstances (1:12–17)

► B. Paul's Attitude (1:18–26)

B. Paul's Attitude (1:18–26)

Paul's description of the circumstances in which he found himself (vv. 12–17) already carried with it an indication of his emotional response to them. But something more explicit was needed, and so we are treated to a remarkable passage in which the apostle lays his heart bare and reveals the deepest motives of his life. We may see a threefold progression in this paragraph. In verses 18–20 Paul expresses unbounded joy on account of his assurance of salvation. In verses 21–24 he makes clear how that salvation is not in any way threatened by the possibility of death. Finally, he reassures the Philippians (vv. 25–26) by expressing his confident hope that he will be released from prison. The resulting outline:

1. Joy in salvation (1:18–20)
2. Death no threat (1:21–24)
3. A word of reassurance (1:25–26)

Exegesis and Exposition

¹⁸What then [shall I say about my troubles]? Quite simply that Christ is being preached—however this may happen, whether by pretense or in truth—and for this result I rejoice. Indeed [try as they may to discourage me] I will continue to rejoice, ¹⁹because I am confident that these adversities will result in my salvation through Jesus Christ's provision of his Spirit in answer to your prayers. ²⁰Such is in fact my hopeful expectation: that I may suffer disgrace in no way, but that with all boldness, now as always, through my life or my death, Christ may be magnified in my body.

²¹[I speak with such boldness] because my life is wholly devoted to Christ and so death would result to my advantage. ²²If nevertheless living in the flesh means fruitful labor, then I cannot decide what to do. ²³You see, I am in straits between the two choices, because on the one hand I do wish to depart so I can be with Christ, since this is much better. ²⁴On the other hand, remaining "in" the flesh is necessary because of you.

²⁵So [being well aware of this need] I am confident that I will stay and remain with all of you so that you may make progress and rejoice in the faith. ²⁶In this way your glorying in Christ will abound through my ministry when I come back to you.

1. Joy in Salvation (1:18–20)

NA²⁷ marks the beginning of a new paragraph with the last three words of verse 18, ἀλλὰ καὶ χαρήσομαι (alla kai charēsomai, and indeed I will rejoice). This understanding is supported by Hawthorne, who comments on the “progressive” character of the combination alla kai, which he paraphrases, “And in addition I will be glad for another reason.” One can just as easily argue that the initial question “What then?”^[1] begins the new paragraph by resuming the thought of verse 12: “whatever my circumstances, the gospel is advancing and thus there is reason for rejoicing.” At any rate, verse 18 is clearly a transitional unit, bringing the previous paragraph to an end and opening a new, but closely related, thought.

A more substantive question is raised by Hawthorne’s comments, namely, the precise relationship between alla kai charēsomai and the earlier phrase ἐν τούτῳ χαίρω (en toutō chairō, in this I rejoice). This is certainly an intriguing repetition, and its emphatic and abrupt character is not satisfactorily explained by Paul’s desire to give an additional reason. Lightfoot shows sensitivity to the emotion of the passage when he remarks that the expression “reflects the conflict in the Apostle’s mind: he crushes the feeling of personal annoyance, which rises up at the thought of this unscrupulous antagonism.” We would go too far if we imagined Paul gritting his teeth as he speaks of rejoicing, but we may be sure that his joyful response was not natural and easy; it would have been unexpected in view of his trials, and therefore it required explanation. (Cf. also Schenk 1984: 144, who comments on the significance of the future tense.)

The explanation is Paul’s assurance that the adversities he has experienced will result in his salvation: οἶδα γὰρ ὅτι τοῦτο μοι ἀποβήσεται εἰς σωτηρίαν (oida gar hoti touto moi apobēsetai eis sōtērian, for I know that this shall turn out for my salvation, v. 19). A common interpretation of this statement is that Paul is certain he will be released from prison (see esp. Hawthorne). No doubt the word sōtēria can sometimes be translated “deliverance,” as NIV and NASB do here; and it is certainly plausible to see in this verse a reference to what Paul describes clearly and explicitly in verses 25–26, namely, his expected release from prison and subsequent visit to Philippi.

This plausibility, however, is only superficial, for the interpretation runs against insurmountable difficulties. In the first place, Paul specifically ties in his adversity with his deliverance. It is not merely that he will be delivered, but that his adversity will result in his deliverance. It makes little sense to say that what Paul has suffered (whether the imprisonment itself or the work of his opponents) will lead to his release. One must note the conceptual parallelism between this statement and the basic thesis of verse 12:

1:12

1:19

ta kat' eme

touto

eis prokopēn tou euangeliou eis sōtērian

elēlythen

apobēsetai

(On the connection between ta kat' eme and touto, see Vincent.) The basis for Paul's encouragement is not merely that things will turn out all right in spite of the problems, but that the problems themselves assist us in our Christian experience. For greater detail on Paul's conception, compare Rom. 5:3–5; in that passage, which provides an interesting parallel, the apostle describes the process that leads from tribulation (thlipsis) to a hope that does not make us ashamed.

Second, the deliverance that Paul speaks about is one that he will experience irrespective of what happens to him in prison: εἴτε διὰ ζωῆς εἴτε διὰ θανάτου (eite dia zōēs eite dia thanatou, whether through life or through death, v. 20). Hawthorne's minimizing of this phrase—by calling it a stock expression that means “totally”—has the ring of special pleading, particularly in view of the significance that the death/life antithesis takes on in the subsequent verses. As Calvin comments: “For it is evident from what follows, that he is not speaking of the safety of the body” (cf. also Greijdanus 1937: 136).

Third, most commentators recognize that Paul is here alluding to Job 13:13–18 in the LXX,^[2] but they rarely point out that this passage clearly deals with matters affecting Job's eternal destiny: “Be silent so that I may speak and relieve my anger. . . . Though the Mighty One should lay hand on me, . . . I will speak, and plead before him. And this will turn out for my salvation [touto moi apobēsetai eis sōtērian], since deceit will not come before him. . . . Behold I am near judgment: I know that I will appear just.” It is Job’s own standing before God that is at issue here (cf. Fee 1995: 130–32). The soteriological import is moreover present in the other occurrences of sōtēria in Philippians (see comments on 1:28 and 2:12).

Fourth, we cannot minimize the pathos in Paul’s striking comment, κατὰ τὴν ἀποκαραδοκίαν καὶ ἐλπίδα μου (kata tēn apokaradokian kai elpida mou, according to my eager expectation and hope); such language ill suits a mere reference to his desire for physical freedom. The word apokaradokia is particularly emphatic; its only other occurrence is in reference to the eager desire of creation for the final redemption, a desire also described as a groaning (Rom. 8:19, 22). With regard to elpis, this is Paul’s standard term for the distinctive and certain hope of the believer (also in the Romans passage, 8:24–25), a hope that will not make us ashamed (Rom. 5:4 and see below). Why Paul would use such (soteriologically) charged terms in describing his desire to be released from prison defies explanation.^[3]

Fifth, Paul expresses his hope (or goal or motivation) in terms that turn our attention to matters of eternal import: “I will have nothing to be ashamed of [αἰσχυνθήσομαι, aischynthēsomai], but with all boldness [παρρησία, parrēsia] . . . Christ will be glorified [μεγαλυνθήσεται, megalynthēsetai] in my body” (v. 20).^[4] The association of aischynomai with elpis in this verse reminds us of Rom. 5:4, where the compound kataischynomai is used in the context of Christian faith and perseverance. Of course, this idea derives from such key passages as Isa. 28:16, quoted in Rom. 9:33 and 10:11, “he who believes in him will not be ashamed [LXX, ou kataischynthēsetai].” The shame of which this verse and many other OT parallels speak is less a subjective feeling of guilt (such as we seem to have in Rom. 1:16) than the objective disgrace experienced by those on whom the judgment of God falls. Schenk (1984: 147) properly calls attention to the contextual synonymy between kataischynō and katargeō (to nullify) in 1 Cor. 1:27–28. Within the context of the believing community, “being put to shame” is in effect the fate of the apostate, a conception reflected in 1 John 2:28: “And now, little children, abide in him so that when he appears we may have boldness [parrēsia] and not be ashamed to face him [kai mē aischynthōmen ap’ autou] at his coming.”

The main difficulty with my understanding of verse 20 is that parrēsia is characteristically used by Paul with reference to the bold proclamation of the gospel (see esp. 2 Cor. 3:12; Eph. 6:19). In response, we should note that a less specific use of the term is clearly attested in Paul (2 Cor. 7:4, “we have confidence in you”). What is more, we need to avoid a false dichotomy between (1) our confidence in God’s salvation and (2) the boldness for witness that flows from that confidence. In other words, my emphasis on a soteriological interpretation of Phil. 1:19–20 does not necessarily exclude some of the concerns expressed by the view that Paul desired and expected to be released from prison to continue the work of evangelization.[5]

All of those considerations point unmistakably to the position that, even if sōtēria in verse 19 alludes in some way to deliverance from prison (could we have a deliberate ambiguity in Paul’s use of this term?), the primary reference is to Paul’s perseverance in faith: the magnification of Christ—not his own freedom or even his life—is Paul’s salvation. The great significance of this point is brought out dramatically by Paul’s forms of expression in his last epistle. In 2 Tim. 4, where Paul shows no expectation of physical deliverance (4:6), he utters a cry for salvation: “The Lord will rescue [rhysetai] me from every evil work and will bring me safely [sōsei] to his heavenly kingdom” (4:18). Or to phrase it in terms of his perseverance: “I have kept the faith” (4:7).

An additional and remarkable point is Paul’s recognition, in verse 19, that his perseverance does not take place automatically but rather through (1) the prayers of the Philippians and (2) the support provided by Jesus’s Spirit. Commentators have debated a few points of syntax in this verse (for which, see the additional notes). The point to note here, however, is that even Paul’s personal growth—his sanctification—does not take place in isolation from the support of the church. It is indeed a sobering thought that our spiritual relationship with God is not a purely individualistic concern; we are dependent on the Spirit’s power in answer to the intercessory prayers of God’s people. And we may add that the Spirit’s help itself is normally manifested through the koinōnia of fellow-believers. The godly Ignatius, early bishop of Antioch, learned this lesson well, as we can tell from his comment to the church in Philadelphia as he was on his way to martyrdom: “your prayer will perfect me” (ἡ προσευχὴ ὑμῶν με ἀπαρτίσει, Phld. 5.1).

2. Death No Threat (1:21–24)

The very last phrase of verse 20 alerts us to the startling thought, now to be developed, that Paul's deliverance does not depend on whether he lives or dies. As we noted in the previous section, Paul can speak of his being delivered from all evil even when he expects to lose his life (2 Tim. 4:18). Such a perspective is jarring not merely to someone unacquainted with the Scriptures but even to a believer who may have noticed the repeated OT references depicting divine blessing in terms of physical safety from enemies and deliverance from death. Indeed, one can argue that the OT phrase "being put to shame" is often equivalent to "dying."^[6] Therefore, for Paul to say that even through death he will be ashamed in nothing demands an explanation. Even more surprisingly, Paul's explanation does not express hope in spite of death but rather focuses on death as the more advantageous alternative.

Before considering the substance of Paul's teaching here, it is necessary to discuss a difficult syntactical question, the ambiguity of verse 22: εἰ δὲ τὸ ζῆν ἐν σαρκί τοῦτό μοι καρπὸς ἔργου καὶ τί αἰρήσομαι οὐ γνωρίζω (ei de to zēn en sarki touto moi karpos ergou kai ti airēsomai ou gnōrizō). The traditional understanding of this statement is to mark the main pause after karpos ergou (lit., fruit of work), so that the protasis extends from ei (if) to ergou and the last five words constitute the apodosis. The resulting translation is: "But if living in the flesh means fruitful work for me, then I do not know what I would choose." This interpretation makes good sense and fits nicely in the context, but other possibilities must be kept in mind (see additional notes).

As it turns out, all of the syntactical possibilities yield basically the same meaning. Yet it is useful to appreciate the nature of the ambiguities in this verse because the style tells us something of exegetical value regarding the emotional context of Paul's words. The spontaneity of Paul's writing (a bubbling forth out of the heart, according to Wilamowitz-Moellendorff 1907: 159) sometimes finds expression in anacoloutha and disjointed clauses. The point is that the apostle here is not making an objective, detached theological statement, nor does he treat us to a sustained contrast between life and death for its mere stylistic impact.

Rather, Paul is laying bare his soul and frankly admitting a certain embarrassment: he acknowledges feeling a tension—a trying, and perhaps almost unbearable, tension—between personal desire (τὴν ἐπιθυμίαν ἔχων, tēn epithymian echōn, v. 23) and Christian duty (ἀναγκαιότερον, anankaioteron, v. 24). “I am in straits [συνέχομαι, synechomai],” says Paul (v. 23). The verb synechomai, when used of personal feelings, indicates at the very least the idea of constraint (cf. 2 Cor. 5:14), and at worst that of torment: in Luke 4:38 of suffering from a fever; in Luke 8:37 of being overcome by fear or terror; in Luke 12:50 of Jesus’s distress as he anticipates his baptism of suffering. Although we cannot simply import the meaning of these references into Philippians, we surely miss the real import of this passage if we fail to see in it an echo of Paul’s psychological ordeal. [7]

The nature of Paul’s tension is described most briefly and powerfully in verse 21, words that have rung from the lips of the faithful during all the Christian centuries: “For to me, to live is Christ, and to die is gain.” Formally, there is a certain logical imbalance in the statement: surely, not only in life but also in death Paul is bound with Christ. Accordingly, Calvin interprets the force of these words as follows: “to me Christ is gain in life and in death.” But this move is quite unnecessary and dilutes the apostle’s emphasis on the advantageous character of death for him (v. 23). The lack of symmetry in verse 21 is itself what lends special force to the statement; precisely because his life finds its total meaning in Christ, his dying—which entails being with Christ (v. 24; see O’Brien 1991: 132–37)—must be viewed as an advantage. Those commentators are surely correct who see a genuine correspondence between “to live is Christ” here and “Christ lives in me” = “I live by faith in the Son of God” in Gal. 2:20 (cf. Schenk 1984: 150).

One further matter requires consideration, namely, the bearing of this passage on the debate regarding soul-sleep.[8] Verse 23 has traditionally been used as a proof-text for the doctrine that, upon death, the believer finds himself immediately in the presence of Christ, even prior to the resurrection. Proponents of soul-sleep argue that death in fact does away with time as far as the consciousness of believers is concerned: when they awaken at the resurrection, no time has passed for them. Paul’s words are therefore thought to be consonant with the doctrine of soul-sleep.

Others simply refuse to use this verse to settle a question that most likely was not in the apostle’s mind at all (cf. Treier 1996). Indeed, it would be unwise to build a whole locus of theology on the basis of this one statement.

Nevertheless, the debate on the doctrine of soul-sleep has a clear and direct relevance to our exegesis of this passage. For truly, if Paul had any notion at all that death meant a prolonged sleep for him, then the tension that is so prominent in the passage would be dissolved immediately. It is hardly credible that Paul would have viewed the choice as difficult as he describes it if leaving the work of the gospel did not in fact entail his being in the presence of Christ. After all, time would not have been done away with in the consciousness of those for whom it was necessary that Paul remain!

3. A Word of Reassurance (1:25–26)

Paul's positive remarks about departing to be with Christ might carry with them the suggestion that he expects death to be imminent. Possibly to forestall such a conclusion, he had already in verse 24 spoken of remaining alive as "more necessary" (see the third additional note on that verse). At any rate, verses 25–26 most certainly expand on this concern. Paul emphatically assures the Philippians that he will be released and resume his ministry among them.

The emphasis is achieved, first, by the construction τοῦτο πεποιθὼς οἶδα (touto pepoithōs oida, being convinced of this [i.e., of the necessity that he remain for the Philippians' sake], I know). The verb oida does not stress certainty in contrast to ginōskō,^[9] but either verb (in opposition, for example, to oiomai, cf. v. 17) would indicate Paul's strong conviction on this matter. Second, note the combination μενῶ καὶ παραμενῶ (menō kai paramenō, I will stay and remain). Attempts have been made to distinguish between the two verbs by attributing a distinctive semantic component to paramenō. Some commentators appeal to the verb's etymology and stress the force of the preposition (with the resulting meaning "stand fast alongside"); others say it means "to continue for a long time" (so Calvin, for whom menō = stay a little while); still others suspect a reference to Christ's coming. The evidence for those distinctions is not forthcoming, however. Besides, such an approach misses the significance of stylistic reinforcement (see the introduction, "Language and Style"): Paul may at times add a word not to introduce a new meaning but to make a greater impact on his readers.

Apart from questions of style, the apostle comforts the Philippians by a moving description of the purpose that will be served by his release: (1) their progress in the faith, (2) their joy in that faith, (3) their abounding glory in Christ through Paul. Paul had already spoken about the progress of the gospel in verse 12; now he focuses on the Philippians' participation in that progress. Just as in prison he had become an instrument for the advance of God's word, so upon his release he will be used to bring greater spiritual health to the believers in Philippi. The effect of his future ministry among the Philippians will be a confirmation that it was indeed necessary for Paul to be released.

One cannot avoid detecting an allusion to the serious difficulties that were manifesting themselves among the Philippian believers. Yet Paul's ministry of spiritual correction was intended to bring, not fear and sorrow, but joy. In different circumstances the news of the apostle's παρουσία (parousia, coming, presence) could raise expectations of judgment (cf. 2 Cor. 13:1–3, 10), so Paul uses this opportunity once again to underscore the joy of Christian experience, one of the great themes of Philippians. In verse 25 we find the common term for joy, χαρά (chara), but in the next verse he shifts to the stronger word καύχημα (kauchēma, pride, grounds for glorying) and assures them that their confident joy can only increase.

An important problem arises in verse 26. The phrase ἐν ἐμοί (en emoi, in me) could be construed directly with kauchēma, yielding such a translation as that of the NASB, "so that your proud confidence in me may abound in Christ Jesus." One need not object to this rendering on theological grounds, for it expresses an unquestionably Pauline concept, as we can gather from 2 Cor. 1:14, "we are your grounds for boasting [kauchēma hymōn esmen], as you also are ours, in the day of our Lord Jesus." If this interpretation of verse 26 is correct—it is supported by Lightfoot, Vincent, and others—we may relate the thought to that in Phil. 2:16, where Paul counts the Philippians' sanctification as his reason for confidence (see also the additional note on 1:11).

On the other hand, it must be pointed out that when Paul uses the verb καυχάομαι (kauchaomai, boast) with the preposition en, he consistently admonishes believers to boast in God, not man, as in 1 Cor. 1:31 and 2 Cor. 10:17, "Let him who boasts boast in the Lord" (a reference to Jer. 9:23–24). In 1 Cor. 3:21 Paul writes, "Let no one boast in men," and in Philippians itself he characterizes believers as those who "glory in Christ Jesus" (3:3). The cognate noun kauchēsis too is used with en in reference to Christ (Rom. 15:17; 1 Cor. 15:31). When the ground of boasting is properly a human being, Paul seems to prefer the preposition hyper, as in 2 Cor. 5:12;

7:4; 8:24; 9:3. We have good reason then to take the en emoi of Phil. 1:26 as instrumental: “so that your boasting may abound in Christ Jesus through my ministry when I return to you.”

Additional Notes

1:19. διὰ τῆς ὑμῶν δεήσεως καὶ ἐπιχορηγίας τοῦ πνεύματος (lit., through your prayers and the provision of the Spirit): The fact that Paul does not repeat the article (τῆς) before the second clause (cf. BDF §276; Robertson 1934: 785–89) has led some commentators to relate the two clauses very closely, even to the point of making ὑμῶν qualify both δεήσεως and ἐπιχορηγίας. But pressing the syntactical principle yields an awkward sense here: “the prayer and Spirit’s help that you supply.” Vincent argues persuasively against this construction, but not so as to exclude the idea that the Spirit’s help comes in answer to prayer.

1:19. On the force of the genitives in these clauses see especially Vincent and Hawthorne. The most important one is ἐπιχορηγίας τοῦ πνεύματος, interpreted by most commentators as a subjective genitive, “the help given by the Spirit” (so NIV; Schenk 1984: 146–47 sees here a chiasm that rules out an objective genitive). On the other hand, Gal. 3:5 (ὁ ἐπιχορηγῶν ὑμῖν τὸ πνεῦμα) offers striking support for the view that the Spirit himself is here regarded as the divine provision (see now Fee 1995: 133). Either an objective or (with Chrysostom) an appositional genitive yields this meaning.

1:20. κατὰ τὴν ἀποκαταδοκίαν καὶ ἐλπίδα μου (lit., according to my expectation and hope): This combination should probably be regarded as an instance of hendiadys, as my translation above suggests. Schenk (1984: 144) agrees, though he goes too far in saying that the use of a single article precludes a semantic differentiation between the two nouns.

1:20. ὅτι ἐν οὐδένι αἰσχυνθήσομαι (lit., that in nothing shall I be put to shame): In support of his general interpretation of this passage, Hawthorne argues that ὅτι here is ruled by οἶδα (v. 19; Schenk [1984: 144] agrees, though with very different conclusions) and thus introduces a second and distinct reason for Paul’s assurance. The only substantive argument Hawthorne (1983: 42) offers is that the object of ἐλπίς is normally expressed, not by a clause introduced with ὅτι, but by a genitive. Such a genitival construction, however, could be used only when the object consists of one or two words. Surely, if Paul needed a sentence to describe the object of his hope, a genitive would not do. (Besides, it is possible that the ὅτι here is a causal conjunction.)

1:20. ἐν τῷ σώματί μου: Hawthorne translates “because of me,” following the interpretation of σῶμα as “person” rather than “body,” but Gundry (1976: 37) argues persuasively, on the basis of the whole context, that the presence of which Paul speaks “is specifically physical.”

1:21. τὸ ἀποθανεῖν κέρδος: The aorist ἀποθανεῖν has inexplicably led commentators astray. Hawthorne says it “accentuates the act of dying” (the aorist tense accentuates nothing; cf. Carson 1996: 68–73; Silva 2001: 73–79). Martin (1976: 77) takes things to quite an extreme by suggesting that this aorist infinitive has the fate of martyrdom in view. Even Lightfoot shows confusion: “The tense denotes not the act of dying but the consequence of dying, the state after death.” This information comes from verse 23, not from the tense (better, aspect). Most surprising of all is Schenk's (1984: 149) emphasis on the specificity of the aorist ("Momentanbegriff"; his reference to the Kühner-Gerth grammar does not really support the claim). There is probably no semantic significance in the tense (ζῆν is a present tense because the aorist ζῆσαι is normally used of "to come to life").

1:22. εἰ δὲ τὸ ζῆν ἐν σαρκί, τοῦτό μοι καρπὸς ἔργου, καὶ τί αἰρήσομαι οὐ γνωρίζω: Several translations are possible. The NASB rendering, "But if I am to live on in the flesh, this will mean fruitful labor for me; and I do not know which to choose," is perhaps the least likely, for it assumes an ellipsis (which Vincent regards as "inadmissible") of the predicate in the protasis. The view that limits the apodosis to three words (καὶ τί αἰρήσομαι, ". . . then what shall I choose? I cannot tell") finds support in 2 Cor. 2:2, where καὶ also introduces the apodosis as a direct question.^[10]

Still another interpretation is that of Lightfoot, who thinks that the true apodosis ("what then?") is not at all expressed, in which case εἰ introduces a question: "But what if living in the flesh means fruitful work for me? In that case [καί = in fact, surely] I cannot tell what I would choose." This is a harsh construction and few have followed Lightfoot (see esp. Vincent's objections). The traditional understanding (adopted in the exposition above) takes the second half of the verse as the apodosis. This view presents two minor problems: one is the superfluous τοῦτο, but such an emphatic restatement of the subject is quite possible and even elegant; the other difficulty is taking καὶ as introducing the apodosis (some other conjunction, e.g., τότε, or no conjunction at all is more common), but this use is attested elsewhere (cf. Vincent).

1:22. γνωρίζω: The meaning found in all other occurrences, "to make known," is inappropriate here, for the resulting translation, "I do not reveal," implies that Paul does know but refuses to let the Philippians in on the secret (Hawthorne defends this rendering). BDAG 203 (meaning 2), sensing this difficulty, gives "to know" as the meaning for both this passage and Diogn. 8.5. It should be pointed out, however, that the references given in support of it have an incipient force, "to obtain knowledge of, discover, recognize, become acquainted with."^[11] Lightfoot's "I do not perceive" is a good attempt, but in fact none of the usual English equivalents for γνωρίζω seems appropriate here, and so the rendering "I do not know" (NASB, NIV, etc.) wins by default. The paraphrase "I cannot tell" is satisfactory, but only so long as it is taken in the colloquial sense of "I do not know" (that is, this rendering should not be chosen on the grounds that it preserves the Greek nuance of "to make known"; see Fee 1995: 145).

1:24. [ἐν] τῇ σαρκί: Though the term "flesh" does not have its strongly pejorative sense here, Calvin is probably right when he says that it reflects contempt "from comparing it to a better life."

1:24. The preposition ἐν is omitted by Sinaiticus and Alexandrinus, a few other uncials, and some important minuscules (e.g., 33, 1739). It could have been omitted accidentally; it could also have been a deliberate change if the scribe felt an incongruity with ἐπί (in ἐπιμένειν). On the other hand, it might have been added on the basis of verse 22, τὸ ζῆν ἐν σαρκί. Since Vaticanus in Paul is suspect when accompanied by "Western" witnesses (D F G), one could argue that the omission has greater external support (in spite of Ɔ⁴⁶). The decision is very difficult, however, and it would be a mistake to attribute the difference to semantic reasons. Pauline usage of ἐπιμένω (Rom. 6:1; 11:22, 23; Col. 1:23) supports omission of ἐν; however, 1 Cor. 16:8 is a close parallel (note the local use of the preposition).

1:24. ἀναγκαιότερον (more necessary): This word is a comparative adjective that Vincent regards as “slightly illogical,” presumably because nothing in the preceding context has been described as necessary. Following Lightfoot, he thinks the form may have been used on the analogy of κρεῖσσον (better, v. 23), but could we not see it as an emphatic word reflecting Paul’s desire to reassure the Philippians?

1:25. οἶδα ὅτι μενῶ: Toward the end of his third missionary journey, Paul told the Ephesian elders, “I know [οἶδα] that you all will no longer see my face” (Acts 20:25). On the basis of this verse J. van Bruggen (1981: 29–30) has argued that Paul indeed never returned to Asia Minor and that the traditional chronology (according to which the apostle traveled east after his first Roman imprisonment) must be wrong. However, the apparent discrepancy between these two verses is satisfactorily dealt with by Lightfoot, who points out that we do not have here “a prophetic inspiration, but a personal conviction” (cf. also Calvin).

1:26. τῆς ἐμῆς παρουσίας: Beare’s inference that Paul may expect a “king’s welcome” puts too much weight on the associations of the word παρουσία. There is certainly no thought of pageantry in other comparable uses of the term (1 Cor. 16:17; 2 Cor. 7:6–7; 10:10; Phil. 2:12).

- I. Opening (1:1–11)
- II. Paul’s Missionary Report (1:12–26)
- ▶ III. A Call to Sanctification (1:27–2:30)
- IV. Doctrinal Polemics (3:1–4:1)
- V. Final Concerns (4:2–23)

III. A Call to Sanctification (1:27–2:30)

The relationship between 1:12–26 and this new section of the epistle is marked by the transitional word μόνον (monon, only). Though Schenk (1984: 167), following Gnllka (1976: 97), views the word not as restrictive but as emphatic (“above all”), the exceptive or adversative nuance should not be ignored. This use of monon is found most clearly in Gal. 2:10 and 5:13 (cf. also 2 Thess. 2:7). The first of these passages is particularly instructive. According to Gal. 2:7–9, the Jerusalem leaders assured Paul that everything was in order. There was only one thing, however, that they must ask of him, and that was to remember the poor in Jerusalem.

Similarly, here in Philippians Paul had given his readers a word of assurance: everything will work out well (vv. 24–26). Nevertheless, there was one matter that concerned him (Barth 1962: 45 sees here “a warning finger”). The Philippians were in danger of overlooking their Christian duty to maintain spiritual unity; intimidated by their opponents, they may slacken their zeal in conflict. The apostle’s injunction must therefore be taken as a serious and fundamental concern in the letter.

Indeed, with 1:27 we reach what must be considered the central section of Philippians (see introduction, “Literary Structure”). In spite of the disproportionate and isolated attention that scholars have paid to 2:5–11, one must insist on the coherence of 1:27–2:18 as an injunction to holy conduct—an element reflected in the outlines of Lohmeyer, Schenk (1984: 165), and others.^[1] The conduct in view is set against the background of the Philippians’ own opponents (1:28), a subject that Paul will return to in chapter 3. But the primary focus is on the united front that Christian humility creates. We may divide this passage into three subsections: (1) the duties of Christian citizenship (1:27–2:4); (2) a description of Christ’s conduct as the model of Christian humility (2:5–11); and (3) a more general, concluding exhortation to Christian obedience (2:12–18).

III. A Call to Sanctification (1:27–2:30)

➤ A. Christian Citizenship (1:27–2:4)

B. Christian Humility (2:5–11)

C. Christian Obedience (2:12–18)

D. Resumption of Paul's Missionary Report (2:19–30)

A. Christian Citizenship (1:27–2:4)

The heading I have chosen for this passage arises from the view that the main verb in 1:27, πολιτεύεσθε (politeuesthe), probably preserves its semantic overtones of the conduct expected of citizens in a state (polis). The meaning “to be a citizen” (implying “to live as a free citizen”) is not only early but also widely attested (see the first additional note on 1:27). The term could often be used also in the general sense of “to deal with, conduct oneself, live,” and this is certainly the verb's meaning in its only other occurrence in the NT, Acts 23:1 (but see Lightfoot). However, Paul's use of the term πολίτευμα (politeuma, citizenship) in Phil. 3:20 suggests that already here in 1:27 he may be appealing to the Philippians' sense of civic duty: “You know the pride and responsibility attached to living in a Roman colony: remember that you have a higher allegiance calling you to faithful conduct.”^[1] This citizenship requires a tenacious spirit (1:27–28) in the face of suffering (1:29–30), something possible only through the strength of Christian unity (2:1–4). The passage may be outlined as follows:

1. Tenacity (1:27–28)
2. Suffering (1:29–30)
3. Unity (2:1–4)

Exegesis and Exposition

^{1:27}[Regardless of my circumstances,] what really matters is that you behave as citizens of heaven, in a manner worthy of the gospel of Christ, so that whether I am able to come and actually see you or remain absent, the news about you will be the same; namely, that you are standing steadfast in unanimity of spirit by struggling jointly with unanimity of soul for the faith proclaimed in the gospel. ²⁸Moreover, do not be intimidated by your opponents; your behavior will be a sign to them that they will be destroyed but that you will receive salvation—and a salvation that comes from God.

²⁹[Indeed, you have no reason to fear,] since your suffering no less than your faith is God's gracious gift to you on behalf of Christ. ³⁰Evidence of this truth is the fact that the conflict you are experiencing is the same conflict you saw me go through—and in fact you have heard "that I am still going through it".

^{2:1}Therefore, if you have experienced at all the comfort that comes from union with Christ, the encouragement that love provides, the fellowship produced by the Spirit, and the compassion that flows from the heart, ²make my joy complete: adopt the same frame of mind, sharing the same love—[yes,] you must adopt the "only" frame of mind [that is proper for those who are] united in their soul. ³Your disposition must not be characterized by selfishness or vain conceit; you must rather in humility regard one another as more excellent than yourselves, ⁴and "each of you" must look out not for your own interests [only] but also for those of others.

1. Tenacity (1:27–28)

The term politeuesthe itself reminds us that Christian responsibility is not a transient affair but a permanent obligation; and if so, it requires the fundamental virtue of perseverance. "Nothing is so incongruous in a Christian, and foreign to his character, as to seek ease and rest" (Chrysostom on 3:18). Hendriksen (1962: 92) chooses the apt term tenacity to describe this virtue, and the importance that it has for Paul may be gathered by the force of his expressions.

First, the apostle tells the believers in Philippi that their proper Christian behavior must continue "whether I come and see you or remain absent." There is no respite from Christian obligation. Just as Timothy must be ready for faithful ministry "in season and out of season" (2 Tim. 4:2), so the Philippians must maintain a consistent witness regardless of their circumstances. It is worth noting, however, that Paul focuses on his own presence/absence to underscore their need for consistency. No doubt this concern is to be explained by the immediately preceding context, where the apostle has assured the Philippians that his absence from them will not be permanent.

Still, one can only wonder why his presence/absence surfaces again in 2:12, also in a context where the readers are enjoined to lead obedient lives. Is it possible that Paul's absence had discouraged some in the Philippian community? Not even Timothy would be able to visit Philippi immediately (2:19–24), and Paul possibly feared that the troubles being experienced by the church could worsen because of his inability to deal with them in person. At any rate, Paul makes clear that his absence did not justify a relaxing of their Christian obligations. Perseverance does not admit of interruptions.

Second, Paul uses two verbs that stress the importance of spiritual tenacity: στήκετε (stēkete, you are standing firm) and συναθλοῦντες (synathlountes, contending together). The verb stēkō is used by Paul in several of his epistles;^[2] it is simply a late form derived from the perfect tense of ἵστημι (histēmi, to stand) and not to be sharply distinguished in meaning from it.^[3] In addition to the firmness and steadfastness suggested by this verb, Christian citizenship requires conscious effort, for it consists in a struggle, as the second verb, synathleō, indicates. The simple form athleō occurs in 2 Tim. 2:5; the only other occurrence of the compound form is also in Philippians and, interestingly, in close proximity to stēkō (4:1, 3; see comments on these verses for the possibility of a literary inclusio).

Third, Paul stresses the tenacity required of Christian believers by pointing out the need for unanimity. This thought is already intimated by synathleō (the prefixed syn-, “with,” speaks of a joint struggle), but we also find an express command made even more forceful by a chiasmic pattern:

A stēkete (you are standing firm)
B en heni pneumati (in one spirit)
B' mia psychē ([with] one soul)
A' synathlountes (contending together)

Paul will develop this concern in 2:1–4 (see comments on that passage) and return to it several times throughout the letter. At the very outset he alerts us to the fundamental thesis that Christian sanctification cannot be reduced to an individualistic exercise. The struggles of the Christian citizen must be faced within the fellowship of the believing community.

Fourth, in verse 28 Paul makes explicit reference to spiritual opposition (already implied by the verb synathleō): καὶ μὴ πτυρόμενοι ἐν μηδενὶ ὑπὸ τῶν ἀντικειμένων (kai mē ptyromenoi en mēdeni hypo tōn antikeimenōn, lit., and not being frightened in any way by the opponents). Whether the Philippian church was experiencing opposition from the pagan environment (so Martin 1976: 83; Bockmuehl 1998: 100–101; cf. Acts 16:19–24) is difficult to prove. Because elsewhere in the letter Paul appears to be greatly concerned about Judaizers (see comments on 3:2), it is reasonable to assume that the same or a similar group is primarily in view here as well (but note the objections raised by Oakes 2001: 81). In any case, the struggle is real and likely to intimidate any believer.

But the Philippians must not be intimidated so as to give up their struggle. Indeed, the very struggle they were experiencing was “a sign to them of [their] destruction but of your salvation” (on σωτηρία, sōtēria, see comments at 1:19). The grammar of verse 28 is difficult (see additional notes), but the meaning seems to be this: the conflict the Philippians are experiencing should be understood as a reminder that they are but a part in the greater conflict between God and the prince of darkness—and if God is with them, who can be against them (Rom. 8:31)? The last clause, “and this from God,” probably refers not exclusively to the word “salvation” (σωτηρία, a feminine noun, is not the grammatical antecedent of the neuter pronoun τοῦτο, touto, this) but rather to the whole complex of ideas: conflict, destruction, perseverance, and salvation. The true grounds for the Philippians’ encouragement was the profound conviction that nothing in their experience took place outside God’s superintendence.

2. Suffering (1:29–30)

Verse 29 begins with the causal conjunction ὅτι (hoti, for, because), and it would be a mistake to ignore its significance. The conjunction γάρ (gar, for) is used frequently as a transitional particle and thus one cannot always assume a causal function. Paul’s use of hoti rather than gar makes clear that verse 29 is intended as the reason or explanation for the surprising statement in verse 28, particularly the emphatic clause at the end, “and this from God.”

The relationship between the two verses may be brought out by a paraphrase: “The conflicts that you are experiencing may appear frightening and thus threaten to discourage you, but you cannot allow that to happen. Perhaps you are tempted to interpret these conflicts as a bad omen, as though God is displeased with you and intends to destroy you. But that is exactly wrong. You must interpret what is happening as evidence of God’s design to save you! Why? Because suffering is the way to glory, God’s gift of salvation for his children.”

Paul’s description of suffering as a gift, ὑμῖν ἐχαρίσθη (hymīn echaristhē, to you it has been granted), is lexically unique in the NT. It is also startling.

Believers find it difficult enough to accept the inevitability of suffering; we feel we are making spiritual progress if we resign ourselves to the fact that grief cannot be avoided. But here the apostle challenges the Philippians' theology and asks them to understand their afflictions not merely as inevitable but as a manifestation of God's gracious dealings with them.

In fact, however, this statement is only the explicit expression of a thought that appears consistently in Scripture, particularly in the Pauline material. According to Luke, Paul told the believers in Asia Minor that tribulations were necessary (dei) to enter the kingdom of God (Acts 14:22); and this "divine necessity" of suffering would become a major theme for the Macedonian believers during Paul's second journey (keimetha, we were destined; 1 Thess. 3:3–4; cf. 2:14 and 2 Thess. 1:4–7). To the Romans he presents suffering as a condition of glorification and therefore as part of that which God works out for their good (Rom. 8:17, 28–30; cf. 2 Cor. 4:10; 2 Tim. 2:12; 1 Pet. 4:13). Moreover, if our requests to God, which so often arise from our afflictions, are to be brought with thanksgiving (Phil. 4:6; cf. Eph. 5:20; Col. 3:15; 1 Thess. 5:18), then clearly the believer is being taught to view sufferings in a positive light. Therefore, when Paul in Phil. 1:29 sets up affliction as a correlative of faith—a necessity and a gift^[4]—he is giving vivid expression to a recurring (though underlying) biblical theme, indeed, to a fundamental truth of Christian citizenship.

Two more factors must be noted. First, Paul qualifies the suffering of which he speaks as a suffering that takes place for the sake of Christ. Whether the words ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ (hyper Christou) may be translated "in Christ's stead" (so Hawthorne, appealing to Col. 1:24–25) is doubtful, for the simplest and contextually most natural idea is that of suffering out of devotion for, on account of our identification with, Christ (cf. hyper tou onomatos, for the name, Acts 5:41). Yet it must be acknowledged that the relationship in view is one of union with Christ, so that in this very letter Paul can speak about sharing in Christ's sufferings (3:10; see the comments there for a discussion of this difficult concept).

(Though not strictly an exegetical issue, the important question arises whether or not physical persecutions, or afflictions suffered as a direct result of the believer's Christian identity, are the only experiences that qualify as suffering for Christ. Neither this passage nor the NT more generally gives an explicit and unequivocal answer to the question. We may consider, however, that for the person whose life is committed in its totality to the service of Christ, every affliction and every frustration becomes an obstacle to fulfilling the goal of serving Christ. It surely would be impossible to think that believers who enjoy freedom of religion and so suffer no physical persecution or religious discrimination are thereby deprived of an essential element in their sanctification. For a fine biblico-theological discussion, see Gaffin 1978–79: 235–40.)

Second, Paul reinforces these words on Christian suffering by calling attention to the correspondence between the Philippians' experience and his own conflicts (v. 30). Already in verse 7 Paul had described his readers as co-participants with him in ministry and suffering, though the reference there is primarily to their support of Paul's ministry. Here, on the other hand, he is quite explicit about what that participation entails: the disciple is no greater than his master. Just as Paul had comforted and encouraged the Thessalonians by appealing to the example of the churches in Judea and even of their Lord (1 Thess. 2:14–16), so here he reminds his readers of his own experiences, both while he was in Philippi (cf. Acts 16:19–40) and at the present time: "you are going through the same conflict I endure; you have seen it with your own eyes and now you hear that it still persists." Clearly, Paul's injunction to his churches to become imitators of him (see on 3:17) entailed a great deal more than may appear on the surface.

3. Unity (2:1–4)

The very close connection between this passage and the preceding verses is apparent, not only from the particle οὖν (oun, therefore, 2:1—resumptive rather than causal, as Schenk 1984: 174 points out) but more substantively from the fact that Paul had made spiritual unanimity a central concern at the very opening of the section (1:27). What had been briefly expressed there with the phrases "in one spirit, with one soul," becomes here a whole paragraph brimming with emotional force.

The structure of the paragraph may be delineated with a literal translation thus:[\[5\]](#)

- A if any comfort in Christ (1a)
 - if any encouragement of love (1b)
 - if any fellowship of the Spirit (1c)
 - if any affection and compassion (1d)
- B make my joy complete (2a)

- C that you may think the same thing (2b)
 - having the same love (2c)
 - joined in soul (2d)
 - thinking the one thing (2e)
- D nothing according to selfishness or empty conceit (3a)
 - but with humility regarding one another as more important than yourselves (3b)
 - not looking out for your own things (4a)
 - but also for those of others (4b)

Without arguing for a clear poetic structure, one must recognize the rhythmic consistency of the short clauses, the repeated parallelism, and the strophic quality of sections A, C, and D. For reasons that will become apparent as we proceed, it will be helpful to begin with a discussion of the second section.

Section B: The note of joy. Grammatically, verses 1–4 constitute but one sentence with one main clause, the imperative of verse 2a, “make my joy complete” (πληρώσατέ μου τὴν χαράν, plērōsate mou tēn charan). To be sure, the main verb of a sentence does not necessarily convey the writer’s main concern. It is plain here that the primary thought of the whole passage focuses not on Paul’s personal yearnings for joy but on the Philippians’ unanimity of mind, enjoined in the subordinate clauses that follow (cf. Hawthorne).

Nonetheless, it would be a mistake to minimize the nature of Paul’s appeal. The Philippians’ afflictions have brought discouragement to the community. Because they have lost, or at least are in danger of losing, the fundamental Christian perspective of joy, the apostle in this letter exhorts them repeatedly to rejoice (2:18; 3:1; 4:4; see introduction, “Distinctive Teaching”). Moreover, Paul reinforces his exhortation by emphasizing the joy that the Philippians have brought to him in spite of his afflictions (1:4). Perhaps Paul recognizes that the key to joy consists in shifting our attention away from ourselves and onto the needs of others. In any case, Paul once again addresses the issue of the Philippians’ unity as the one matter that concerns him (see above on monon, 1:27), as the one problem that is preventing him from experiencing full joy with regard to his Philippian brethren.

Section C: Spiritual oneness. The central thought of this passage is conveyed by the four brief clauses that constitute section C. The first and last of these (2b, ἵνα τὸ αὐτὸ φρονῆτε, hina to auto phronēte; 2e, τὸ ἓν φρονοῦντες, to hen phronountes) are virtually identical, though the use of hen perhaps makes 2e more emphatic than 2b (so Lightfoot). Unity of mind is therefore Paul's pervasive concern in this exhortation (on the significance of phroneō see introduction, "Distinctive Teaching").

The two intervening units (2c–d, τὴν αὐτὴν ἀγάπην ἔχοντες, σύμψυχοι, tēn autēn agapēn echontes, sympsychoi) are not intended to bring up additional factors, but to reinforce that main concern. In other words, to have the same love and to be "soul-joined" are in effect explanatory of to auto/hen phronein. The latter expression certainly does not focus on intellectual uniformity but on a whole frame of mind that we can perhaps best describe as spiritual oneness (cf. the corresponding expression in 1 Cor. 1:10 [hina to auto legēte, lit., that you speak the same thing], explained by the following clause, "so that there may be no divisions among you"). Paul's fourfold repetition of this concern cannot be viewed as carelessness of style; rather, it is a deliberate "tautology of earnestness" (Lightfoot 1868: 67) intended to move the hearts of his readers and awaken them to the importance of the injunction.

Section D: Humility as the key to unity. Verses 3–4, which expand the central exhortation of section C, consist of two units, each of which contains a negative clause; in turn, each of these is followed by a positive clause introduced with ἀλλά (alla, but). The overarching concern of this section is sounded out by ταπεινοφροσύνη (tapeinophrosynē, humility), which alludes to the verb phroneō, as Chrysostom suggests: "This virtue is called humble-mindedness, because it is the humbling of the mind [phronēma]." More precisely, the term is in effect contextually defined by its opposition to such expressions as "selfishness" and "looking out for oneself" (see further O'Brien 1991: 180–82). The term "selfishness" (ἐριθεία, eritheia) must have struck a sensitive nerve among the Philippians because Paul had used it earlier to describe his opponents who preach the gospel with impure motives (1:17; note also the presence of phthonon, envy, in 1:15).

The true obstacle to unity is not the presence of legitimate differences of opinion but self-centeredness. Shifting attention away from ourselves becomes the challenge: "regard one another as better than yourselves, look out for the interests of others” (the verbs hēgeomai and skopeō continue to emphasize the mental disposition; Schenk [1984: 183] views skopeō as a contextual synonym for phroneō). Not surprisingly, Paul expresses similar concerns when writing to the most blatantly schismatic of his churches, Corinth. As a capstone to his discussion of Christian liberty Paul says, “Let no one seek his own good, but that of others” (1 Cor. 10:24). And the love referred to in Phil. 2:2 is described in 1 Cor. 13:5 as one that “does not seek its own.”

Section A: The grounds of Paul’s exhortation. The fourfold exhortation of section C (v. 2) is grounded in the fourfold appeal of verse 1. One advantage of postponing consideration of section A until this point is that now we are in a better position to appreciate the rhetorical qualities of the passage and can therefore be less concerned about identifying in precise detail all the references in this verse. Does ἀγάπης (agapēs) refer to God’s love, or Paul’s, or the Philippians’? Are παράκλησις (paraklēsis) and παραμύθιον (paramythion) to be distinguished or not—and do they have an objective or subjective reference here? (Cf. Hawthorne’s substantive treatment of these issues, and see the additional notes on 2:1.) These and other questions cannot be answered with any certainty. Nor should they. The clauses are deliberately compressed and vague, since the appeal is primarily emotional. That is, verse 1 is not intended to function as a set of four rational, theological arguments but rather as impassioned pleading.

The Greek text has no verb expressed in these four clauses, and their force has been explained in various ways. For example, the NASB supplies “there is.” This translation is of course grammatically correct, but it may leave the impression that the apostle is appealing to the (general) existence of these qualities, whereas he surely has in mind the Philippians’ specific experience of them, as indicated by the NIV: “if you have. . . .” (In contrast, Chrysostom views Paul as the object of the implied verbs: “if ye wish to give me any comfort in my temptations”; cf. also Heriban 1983: 174–76 for alternate views.)

The impact of these words should make it clear that Paul’s exhortation to unity arose out of very real and particular shortcomings in the Philippian community. These Christians, no doubt, constituted a healthy church, but the seeds of dissension had been sown and they were not to be allowed to sprout, lest Paul’s work among them should prove to have been in vain (2:16).

Additional Notes

11:27. πολιτεύεσθε: In support of the view that the verb preserves the nuance of citizenship, cf. Philo, Conf. Tong. 17 §§77–78: “all whom Moses calls wise are represented as sojourners. . . . To them the heavenly region, where their citizenship lies [ἐν ᾧ πολιτεύονται], is their native land; the earthly region in which they became sojourners is a foreign country.” Diognetus 5.9 (a Christian writing of the second or third century) describes Christians as those who “pass their time upon the earth, but . . . have their citizenship in heaven [ἐν οὐρανῷ πολιτεύονται].” First Clement uses the verb on several occasions with the more general sense “live,” but the idea of citizenship becomes explicit in 54.4, “those who live without regrets as citizens in the city of God [οἱ πολιτευόμενοι τὴν ἀμεταμέλητον πολιτείαν τοῦ θεοῦ].”^[6]

1:27. ἵνα εἴτε ἐλθὼν καὶ ἰδὼν ὑμᾶς εἴτε ἀπὼν ἀκούω τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν (lit., so that, whether coming and seeing you or being absent, I may hear about you): As Lightfoot helpfully points out, the expected syntactical symmetry is lost when Paul uses the finite verb ἀκούω instead of the participial phrase καὶ ἀκούων. He may be wrong, however, in his view that ἀκούω refers to the second clause only; Meyer argues that Paul’s construction is a valid use of zeugma (i.e., the application of a word to two other words when, strictly interpreted, it is appropriate to only one of them). At any rate, this is a good example of Paul’s relative indifference to tight grammatical constructions (Calvin: “We need not . . . worry over the words, when the meaning is plain”). As for the εἴτε, Meyer is probably correct that it does not cast doubt on the possibility of Paul’s deliverance from prison but rather assumes such a deliverance. My paraphrase (“the news about you will be the same”) attempts not only to smooth the syntax but also to bring out the nuance attached to the idiomatic τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν (cf. additional note on τὰ κατ’ ἐμέ, 1:12).

1:27. The present subjunctive ἀκούω is the Alexandrian reading (with additional support from D). The Majority text gives the aorist form ἀκούσω, with some significant early support. If the present is indeed original, the accompanying aorist participles may have influenced the change. No semantic distinction is likely to have affected scribal changes here.

1:27. ἐν ἐνὶ πνεύματι, μιᾷ ψυχῇ (lit., in one spirit, [with] one soul): Some scholars believe that πνεῦμα here refers to the Holy Spirit, and this view has been strongly defended by Fee (1995: 163–66) on the grounds that there is no Pauline analogy for the present usage as a reference to the human spirit. Fee overstates his case, however, and it is difficult to believe that the word should not be taken in parallelism with ψυχῇ (see esp. Hawthorne; generally speaking, the immediate context should be given preference over broader contextual data, as argued in Silva 1994: 156–57). Assuming then that both terms are anthropological, the question arises whether they are to be distinguished. Calvin, for example, believes that the spirit is the faculty of the understanding, whereas the soul is that of the will; Lightfoot sees here the more general distinction between spirit as the principle of the higher life and soul as the seat of the affections. In the present context, however, the rhetorical effect of using two terms appears to overrule sharp semantic distinctions (see introduction, “Language and Style”). One should certainly not be misled into thinking that steadfastness is the particular function of the spirit while the soul specializes in struggling. In any case, the apostle here is not concerned with ontology or human psychology, but with mental harmony, singleness of purpose, harmonious attitudes.

1:27. συναθροῦντες τῇ πίστει τοῦ εὐαγγελίου: How we render this clause depends on whether we take τῇ πίστει as a dative of advantage (“for the faith”; perhaps instrumental, as Calvin suggests) or as ruled by συν- (“with the faith”). Lightfoot finds the former construction “harsh and improbable” and prefers to translate, “striving in concert with the faith”; but Paul’s emphasis on the Philippians’ unanimity is the simplest explanation for the preposition (“contending jointly”).

A further question is whether or not πίστει should be taken in the objective sense of “message”; if so, then εὐαγγελίου is functioning as a subjective genitive (cf. Hawthorne: “to preserve the faith brought about by the gospel”) or as exegetical (“the faith, namely the gospel”). Others, less convincingly, prefer to view πίστει as subjective and εὐαγγελίου as an objective genitive: “with trust in the gospel” (or, following Schenk 1984: 168, “for the greater reception of the gospel”). Still a third possibility is to see here the passive sense of “faithfulness” (NBE: “por la fidelidad a la buena noticia”), which agrees well with the emphasis of the context on steadfastness. Perhaps the best solution is Vincent’s attempt to find a middle way: “the rule of life which distinctively characterises” the gospel.

1:28. ἥτις ἐστὶν αὐτοῖς ἔνδειξις ἀπωλείας, ὑμῶν δὲ σωτηρίας (lit., which is to them a sign of destruction, but of your salvation): The syntax of these words is difficult, partly because the grammatical antecedent of “which” (ἥτις) is ambiguous, partly because the dative pronoun αὐτοῖς leads one to expect the dative ὑμῖν (rather than the genitive ὑμῶν; indeed the Majority text smooths the sentence in this way). Most commentators, beginning with Chrysostom, identify the antecedent of ἥτις as the immediately preceding clause, i.e., the Philippians’ fearlessness in the face of opposition, though it was suggested above that the more general thought of the conflict itself is the sign of which Paul speaks (see also comments on vv. 29–30). The feminine gender of ἥτις is plausibly explained by most writers as attraction to ἔνδειξις. As for the apparent incongruity of ὑμῶν, one need look no further than verse 27 to be reminded of Paul’s relative lack of concern for strict syntax. In any case, writers such as Gnilka (1976: 100) and Schenk (1984: 169–70) are correct in pointing out that Paul did not have in mind one sign for the enemies and another one for the believers; both signs were directed at the Philippians’ opponents.

Hawthorne probably exaggerates the problems here when he describes the clause as “extraordinarily difficult to interpret.” He then proposes that ὑμῶν applies to both ἀπωλείας and σωτηρίας, with this resulting idea: “For although they see your loyalty to truth [ἥτις referring to πίστει] as inevitably leading to your persecution and death . . . you see it as leading through persecution to the salvation of your souls.” The sense thus achieved is attractive but the syntax is barely defensible. Moreover, the close conceptual parallel in 2 Thess. 1:4–8 argues strongly against this new interpretation: “The fact that [the Thessalonians] are enduring persecution and affliction for Christ’s sake is a sure token of God’s righteous judgment, which will be vindicated in them and in their persecutors at the Advent of Christ” (Bruce 1982: 149). This parallel, incidentally, makes plain that “destruction” and “salvation” in Phil. 1:28 should be understood in their strongest soteriological sense.

1:29. ἐχαρίσθη: Schenk’s (1984: 170) comment that the aorist refers to the “Anfangszeit” (temporal beginning) is a surprising overloading of the tense.

1:29. ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ: This phrase is not to be construed with what precedes, as is suggested by some English translations (e.g., NASB: “to you it has been granted for Christ’s sake”), but rather with πάσχειν, “to suffer for Christ’s sake.” As Lightfoot points out, “The sentence is suspended by the insertion of the after-thought” (namely, the clause οὐ μόνον τὸ εἰς αὐτὸν πιστεύειν), then it is resumed with ἀλλὰ καί. This syntax, however, can hardly be reproduced in a translation. On the anaphoric use of the article with the infinitive, see BDF §399.

1:30. ἔχοντες: This participle is in the nominative case, whereas one expects the dative ἔχουσιν in agreement with the pronoun ὑμῖν, to which the participle refers—still another example of syntactical looseness.

1:30. ἀγῶνα (contest): Paul’s use of this word in Col. 2:1 and 1 Thess. 2:2 does not clearly suggest the athletic imagery, but 1 Tim. 6:12 and 2 Tim. 4:7 do so (cf. Heb. 12:1). Here in Philippians the presence of συναθλέω in 1:27 and the more explicit imagery in 2:16 and 3:13–14 justify seeing an athletic allusion in 1:30.

1:30. ἐν ἐμοί: The second occurrence of this phrase is omitted in Ψ⁴⁶, possibly one more example of the scribe’s carelessness (see introduction, “Textual History”). Since the omission is supported by minuscule 81, however, a desire to avoid repetition could account for the variant.

2:1. εἴ τις: The conjunction does not suggest doubt any more than comparable English expressions such as “if you love me” (= show your love for me), but one should resist the tendency to translate with “since” (cf. Schenk 1984: 173), for this rendering weakens the rhetorical force of the passage. The repetition of the indefinite pronoun has led to some changes in the textual tradition. None of them is strongly attested, nor do they have an effect on the sense.

2:1. παράκλησις . . . παραμύθιον: Lightfoot, followed by many others, argues that since the thrust of the sentence as a whole is an exhortation to unity, “παράκλησις should be taken here to mean not ‘consolation’ but ‘exhortation,’” and that παραμύθιον, though it commonly means “comfort,” in this context bears the sense of “a motive of persuasion or dissuasion.” This general understanding was adopted in the first edition of the present work, but O’Brien (1991: 167–71) has argued cogently that the notion of comfort or consolation is what provides the grounds for the exhortation in v. 2 (see also Calvin 1965: 244; Fee 1995: 179–80).

2:1. κοινωνία πνεύματος: On the term κοινωνία, see comments on 1:5. The genitive, like ἀγάπης, is best understood in the sense “brought about by.”

2:1. σπλάγχνα καὶ οἰκτιρμοί: These two nouns are joined grammatically in Col. 3:12, σπλάγχνα οἰκτιρμοῦ (heart of compassion = compassionate heart or heartfelt compassion; cf. also σπλάγχνα ἐλέους, heart of mercy, Luke 1:78). Possibly we have here a hendiadys with the same meaning as in Col. 3:12. On the other hand, σπλάγχνα was used in Phil. 1:8 of the affection itself rather than of the seat of the affections (the heart), and so it would be defensible to render, “tenderness and compassion” (so NIV). O’Brien (1991: 175–76) argues that the focus is on divine qualities, but Fee (1995: 182) extends that idea by paraphrasing: “if God’s compassion and mercy have produced those same qualities in you toward me, as you know I have toward you.”

2:2. ἵνα τὸ αὐτὸ φρονῆτε: (lit., so that you may think the same thing): The ἵνα here does not indicate purpose but probably introduces the content of an implied exhortation (supply παρακαλῶ, I beseech). The rendering “by being like-minded” (NASB, similarly NIV) reproduces the thought well.

2:2. σύμψυχοι, τὸ ἓν φρονοῦντες (NASB: “united in spirit, intent on one purpose”): Meyer, followed by Alford (1871–75: 3.165), Vincent, et al., makes of these words one clause: “with harmony of soul cherishing the one sentiment.” There is much to be said for this construction, which is perhaps reflected in the NIV (“being one in spirit and purpose”), but it has not been picked up by recent scholars. The change from ἓν to αὐτό in some manuscripts (including the first hand of Sinaiticus), whether accidental or intentional, is evidence that the two words were (properly) understood as interchangeable in this context (contrast Heriban 1983: 191, who stresses the function of the article).

2:3. μηδὲ κατὰ κενοδοξίαν: A few minuscules have ἢ κατὰ, whereas other witnesses have only μηδέ (℣⁴⁶ and a corrector of Sinaiticus) or only ἢ (“Western” witnesses followed by the Majority text). These variations, possibly to be viewed as stylistic improvements, do not affect at all the sense of the passage.

2:3. The term κενοδοξία, which is attested as early as Polybius (Hist. 3.8.9, with τῷφος, delusion), occurs nowhere else in the NT but Paul uses the cognate κενόδοξος in Gal. 5:26, where it appears to be understood as involving a spirit of envy and provocation. Perhaps that is the nuance here in Philippians. Heriban (1983: 198–200) provides a critique of various speculative interpretations of verse 3.

2:4. For the textual variations of ἕκαστος and ἕκαστοι see Lightfoot’s fine discussion. My translation of this verse with the added words “not only” reflects the implications of the καί in the second part of the verse. The omission of that conjunction in “Western” witnesses is best interpreted as accidental, and so the brackets in NA²⁷ are not really necessary. (It is however possible that the conjunction was added by scribes who may have thought that, without it, Paul’s language was too strong—as though it were wrong to look out for one’s own interests at all.)

- III. A Call to Sanctification (1:27–2:30)
 - A. Christian Citizenship (1:27–2:4)
 - ▶ B. Christian Humility (2:5–11)
 - C. Christian Obedience (2:12–18)
 - D. Resumption of Paul's Missionary Report (2:19–30)

B. Christian Humility (2:5–11)

The meaning of this well-known passage will be ascertained only if we can determine how the passage functions in the context of the whole letter. In what way do these verses contribute to achieving the apostle's purposes? The question is hotly debated, as the subsequent exposition will show. Yet careful attention to the earnest concerns of the previous section (1:27–2:4) suggests a simple, yet profound, answer.

If the opposition being experienced by the Philippians calls for steadfastness, if steadfastness is impossible without spiritual unity, and if unity can come about only from an attitude of humility, then surely Paul must reinforce the critical importance of humility in the heart of believers. And what better way to reinforce this thought than by reminding the Philippians of the attitude and conduct of him to whom they are united in faith? When admonishing the Corinthians to contribute generously for the sake of the poor in Jerusalem, Paul sets before them the example of Christ: “though he was rich, he became poor on account of you, so that through his poverty you might become rich” (2 Cor. 8:9). Similarly here he appeals to the spirit of servanthood that brought Jesus to his death—a death which, incidentally, has overflowed in life for the Philippians.

Modern scholarship has been preoccupied with the question of whether verses 6–11 come originally from Paul or whether he has simply made use of an already existing poem that puts us in touch with the worship and doctrine of the early church. The question is of considerable importance, because the historical reconstruction of the earliest Christian period provides one of the contexts against which the NT must be interpreted. Although it would therefore be a mistake to minimize the significance of these issues as having “merely historical interest,” Strimple (1978–79: 250–51) is certainly correct in insisting that the proper exegesis of Phil.

2:5–11 must be based on its literary setting.^[1] Whether or not Paul composed these words originally, he certainly used them to support the argument of verses 1–4, and it is primarily in that light that the words must be exegeted. Much of the present exegetical confusion, in fact, may be blamed on the tendency to overemphasize the pre-Pauline setting of our passage, and thus to wrest it from the only context in which it has come down to us.

Closely related to the issue of authorship is that of structure, but this matter has greater relevance to the exegetical task. Although one can hardly prove that verses 6–11 in whole or in part constitute a formal poem or hymn, it would be foolhardy to deny the strong poetic qualities of the passage. Even the label “elevated prose” does not do justice to the rhythm, parallelisms, lexical links, and other features that characterize these verses. Unfortunately, a baffling diversity of opinion exists regarding the proper way of arranging these lines; indeed, at least half a dozen arrangements can be easily defended.^[2] This factor alone should be sufficient to shatter one’s hopes of rediscovering “the original hymn,” if there was such a thing.

Without claiming to be able to determine the correct (original?) structure of verses 6–11, I nevertheless find Lohmeyer’s (1928: 5–6) identification of six three-line stanzas attractive in its simplicity and exegetically useful. The first three stanzas speak of Jesus’s humiliation, the last three of his exaltation. The stress marks provided on the following transliteration suggest one possible way of reading the lines with a fairly consistent (but certainly not perfect) rhythm. The literal translation is deliberately artificial in order to convey something of the rhythm of the original.

hos en morphē theou hypárchōn oúch harpagmón hēgēsato to eínai ísa theō who in the form of God existing not an advantage considered his being equal with God

allá heautón ekénōsen morphēn doúlou labōn en homoiōmati anthrōpōn genómenos

but nothing he made himself the form of a servant adopting in likeness of men becoming kai schēmati heuretheís hōs ánthrōpos etapeínōsen heautón genómenos hypēkoos mechri thanátou—thanátou de staurouí and in appearance being found as man he humbled himself becoming obedient to death—and death of a cross

dio kai ho theós autón hyperýpsōsen kai echarísato autō to ónoma to hypér pan ónoma

therefore also exalted him God and granted him the name that's above ev'ry name

hína en tō onómati Iēsoú pan góny kámpsē epouraniōn kai epigeiōn kai katachthoniōn

so that in the name of Jesus ev'ry knee may bow of those in heav'n and on earth and under the earth kai pása glōssa exomologēsētai hoti kýrios Iēsoús Christós eis dóxan theoú patrós

and every tongue may confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to God the Father's glory

The word epouraniōn (middle line of fifth stanza) may well belong in the following line, as Lohmeyer's own arrangement suggests. Indeed, most scholars see epouraniōn kai epigeiōn kai katachthoniōn as constituting one line. The words thanatou de staurou at the end of the third stanza create a problem for any attempt to bring out a strophic arrangement (see the comments on that phrase). Other difficulties with this arrangement will be considered below. In any case, the passage may be treated according to the following divisions:

1. Paul's exhortation (2:5)
2. Christ's humiliation (2:6–8)
3. Christ's exaltation (2:9–11)

Exegesis and Exposition

⁵“Adopt” “then” this frame of mind in your community—which indeed [is proper for those who are] in Christ Jesus.

⁶Though he existed in the form of God, Christ took no advantage of his equality with God. ⁷Instead, he made himself nothing by assuming the form of a servant, that is, by becoming “incarnate”. ⁸And having appeared as a mere man, he further humbled himself by becoming obedient to the point of death—and no less than the death of the cross.

⁹For this very reason God has exalted him above all things by granting to him as a gift the name that is above every name, ¹⁰so that the whole universe may bow in adoration before the name of Jesus— ¹¹indeed, so that every tongue “may confess” that Jesus Christ is the divine Lord, for the glory of God the Father.

1. Paul's Exhortation (2:5)

The traditional rendering of verse 5 is sometimes referred to as the ethical interpretation because it understands Paul to say that Christ is our pattern of behavior: “Have this mind in you which was also in Christ Jesus” (so KJV; similarly NASB and NIV, both of which use the word “attitude”). This approach takes ἐν ὑμῖν (en hymin) in the sense of “within you” and supplies the verb ἦν (ēn, was) in the second part of the verse.

Since Käsemann’s 1950 (ET 1968) contribution, however, disenchantment with the ethical interpretation has led many scholars to reject this handling of the syntax and to adopt the view, lucidly defended by Deissmann (1892: 113–17), that the verb to be supplied in the second part of the verse is φρονεῖτε (phroneite, you think). The resulting literal translation is “Think among you that which you also think in Christ Jesus.” Various nuances are then possible, such as, “Think among yourselves as it is necessary to think in view of your corporate union with Christ.”^[3]

This paraphrase, which yields a very good sense, brings out clearly the main point of the debate. According to Deissmann and those who follow him, the clause “which also in Christ Jesus” is not a reference to the inner thoughts of Jesus but is rather to be taken in the usual sense of the Pauline formula ἐν Χριστῷ (en Christō). If, in fact, the verse appeals to the Philippians’ union with Christ and not to his attitude, interpreters then feel justified in abandoning the ethical understanding of verses 6–11. Particularly influential has been the interpretation of Käsemann, according to whom verse 5 corresponds to passages like Rom. 6:1–11, where Paul deduces “Christian conduct from the act of salvation.” If so,

Paul did not understand the hymn as though Christ were held up to the community as an ethical example. The technical formula “in Christ,” whatever else might be said about it, unquestionably points to the salvation-event. . . . The salvation-event is indivisible and serves as the basis for the Christian’s condition either altogether or not at all. (Käsemann 1968: 84)

Now it must be stated at the outset that the traditional understanding of the syntax, adopted by most conservative writers, is very difficult to defend. In the first place, τοῦτο φρονεῖτε ἐν ὑμῖν (touto phroneite en hymin) almost certainly means, “think this [have this disposition] among you.” The idea of individuals thinking to or within themselves would normally be expressed with heautois rather than hymin (cf. legein en heautois, Matt. 3:9); moreover, this idea is not expressed with phronein en elsewhere. The translation “among” is accepted by some recent defenders of the traditional view, such as Strimple (1978–79: 253), but that concession gives up one of the strongest arguments for the traditional view, namely, the insistence that the preposition en should have the same force in both parts of the clause.[4] If the first en does not express the notion of something (thought, attitude) being in or within someone, then the reader would hardly expect such a reference in the next occurrence of the preposition.

In the second place, the possibility of supplying the verb ēn (was) in the latter half of the verse is not likely to have occurred to a Greek speaker. If we begin with the English, “Have this mind in you,” then it may seem natural to interpret the second clause as has been done traditionally, but the Greek simply says, “think.” In short, there is nothing in the first clause to suggest that a verb other than phroneō should be supplied in the second clause. Lightfoot, aware of this difficulty, suggests that we supply the imperfect passive form ephroneito (yielding the translation “which was also thought in Christ Jesus”), but he recognizes the irregular character of the resulting construction.[5]

A third objection to the traditional view is Deissmann’s (1892: 116) appeal to two important parallels, namely, the only other occurrences of the combination phronein en in the NT. One of these is in this very epistle: “I urge Euodia and I urge Syntyche to think the same thing in the Lord” (to auto phronein en kyriō, 4:2). The context is the same: an appeal to unity and humility, qualities that must come to expression by virtue of our bond in Christ. The other passage, Rom. 15:5, provides an even fuller parallel: Paul prays that God will grant the Romans “to think the same thing among each other according to Christ Jesus” (to auto phronein en allēlois kata Christon Iēsoun). This verse throws light on both clauses of Phil. 2:5: just as en hymin corresponds to en allēlois (which can hardly mean “within yourselves”), so en Christō Iēsou corresponds to kata Christon Iēsoun, “according to Christ Jesus,” a deliberately general expression that calls attention to our relationship with Christ (although it may well include a reference to Jesus’s example; see below).[6]

We conclude, therefore, that en Christō Iēsou in Phil. 2:5 is a reference to the Philippians’ relationship to Christ and that the verse is best understood thus: “Be so disposed toward one another as is proper for those who are united in Christ Jesus.”[7] Does this conclusion lead us to abandon the ethical interpretation of verses 6–11? By no means. Much of the current discussion is plagued by false dichotomies. Strimple (1978–79: 255) rightly argues against “drawing a superficial antithesis between Heilsgeschichte and ethics” and quotes some apt comments by Hooker (1975: 154): “It is only the dogma that the Jesus of History and the Christ of faith belong in separate compartments that leads to the belief that the appeal to a Christian character appropriate to those who are in Christ is not linked to the pattern as seen in Jesus himself.”[8]

We should note in this regard Paul’s desire to share in the sufferings of Christ (Phil. 3:10). Even though these words clearly speak of union with Christ, they hardly preclude the idea that believers suffer as Jesus suffered (1 Thess. 2:14–15). Those who are united with Christ live as he did (cf. 1 John 2:6), and so the notion of Jesus as an ethical example is implicit in Phil. 2:5 by the very nature of the subject matter. It should be pointed out, moreover, that Rom. 15:5 (which I cited earlier against the traditional view of 2:5) is set precisely in the context of an appeal to Christ as the model of one who “did not please himself” (Rom. 15:3).

Finally, we should consider the objection that the ethical understanding of the Christ-hymn renders verses 9–11 irrelevant. According to Martin (1976: 93), “On any other interpretation than Käsemann’s, verses 9–11 are left ‘in the air’ and must be treated as an excursus, because Christ’s elevation to world rulership cannot be the theme of the Christian’s imitation.”[9] This is a puzzling criticism that can be made only on the assumption, already disputed, that redemptive-historical events and ethical example are antithetical ideas. Moreover, the objection flies in the face of substantive evidence that the promise of vindication is a central biblical theme, used as the basis for encouragement to those undergoing suffering and humiliation. Without pausing to consider the numerous relevant passages in the OT prophets, we may recall such sayings of Jesus as Mark 8:34–35 and 10:28–30, and well-known paraenetic sections like Heb. 12:1–2; James 5:7–11; 1 Pet. 3:17–22; 4:12–13; and virtually the whole book of Revelation.

Paul is even more explicit in linking Jesus’s humiliation/exaltation with that of believers: “. . . if we suffer with him, so that we may also be glorified with him” (Rom. 8:17; cf. 2 Tim. 2:11). More to the point, Philippians itself makes repeated references to the promise of vindication in the Last Day as a source of encouragement for proper Christian conduct (1:6, 9–11, 27–28; 2:14–16; 3:10–14, 17–21; 4:5). One is therefore baffled to read that, because the Philippians were plagued by disunity and selfishness, “the last thing Paul needed to do . . . was to appeal to some hedonistic ethic that promised a future glory if only the Philippians would take the road of humility” (Martin 1997: xxxvii).^[10] No church had greater problems with disunity and selfishness than the Corinthian community, yet to them Paul says: “Do you not know that those who run in a race all run, but one receives the prize? Run in such a way that you may get it” (1 Cor. 9:24).

2. Christ’s Humiliation (2:6–8)

Perhaps the strongest argument that can be advanced against the six-strophe arrangement suggested above is the striking parallelism that appears when, instead, verses 6–8 are arranged as two stanzas of four lines each:^[11]

| | |
|--|--|
| hos en morphē theou hyparchōn | en homoiōmati anthrōpōn genomenos |
| ouch harpagmon hēgēsato to einai isa theō | kai schēmati heuretheis hōs anthrōpos |
| alla heauton ekenōsen | etapeinōsen heauton |
| morphēn doulou labōn | genomenos hypēkoos mechri thanatou |
| who in the form of God existing | in likeness of men becoming |
| not an advantage considered his being equal with God | and in appearance being found as man |
| but nothing he made himself | he humbled himself |
| the form of a servant adopting | becoming obedient to death |

In this arrangement, the first stanza begins and ends with the noun μορφή (morphē, form), whereas the second stanza begins and ends with the participle γενόμενος (genomenos, having become). This feature can easily be interpreted as inclusio (see introduction, “Literary Structure”) and may suggest that indeed these lines begin and end discrete units. Moreover, each line of the first stanza finds some parallelism in the corresponding line of the second stanza. In both stanzas the first line contains a participle, and the participle rules a prepositional phrase. The contrast between God and man in that line is repeated in the second line. The third line of each stanza describes Christ’s voluntary act (“he emptied/humbled himself”). Finally, both stanzas conclude with a participial clause. Whether or not such an arrangement puts us in touch with the original structure of the hymn, it is certainly suggestive and may have a bearing on exegesis.

In any case, the apparent meaning of these striking lines is that the divine and preexistent Christ did not regard the advantage of his deity as grounds to avoid the incarnation; on the contrary, he was willing to regard himself as nothing by taking on human form. Then he further lowered himself in servanthood by obeying God to the point of ignominious death. A great deal of modern scholarship, to be sure, has been directed to show that this apparent meaning is not the real meaning, but the effort has been completely unsuccessful. We shall look at these verses under the following headings: the initial clause (v. 6a); Christ's voluntary act negatively stated (v. 6b–c); Christ's voluntary act positively stated (vv. 7–8).

a. The initial statement (v. 6a). Much of the debate centers on the first line, “although he existed in the form of God,” particularly the force of the word “form” (morphē). If we stress the classical usage of this term, the technical sense of Aristotelian philosophy suggests itself: morphē, although not equivalent to ousia (being, essence), speaks of essential or characteristic attributes and thus is to be distinguished from schēma (the changeable, external “fashion”). In a valuable excursus on morphē and schēma, Lightfoot (1868: 127–33) argued along these lines and remarked that even in popular usage these respective meanings could be ascertained (cf. Trench 1880: 261–67). The many references where morphē is used of physical appearance (see the third additional note on 2:6) make it difficult to maintain Lightfoot's precise distinction, though there is an important element of truth in his treatment, as we shall soon see.

Käsemann (1968: 59–60) emphatically rejects the classical background on the basis of parallels in the literature of the Hellenistic religions, since “the conceptual language of the hellenistic period moves within an ideological framework quite different from that . . . of the classical Greek era.” According to this new language, morphē “no longer means the individual entity as a formed whole, but a mode of being [Daseinsweise] in a specific direction, such as, for example, being in divine substance and power.” In his discussion, Käsemann overstates the significance of the prepositional construction.^[12] Moreover, his dependence on the gnostic “heavenly man” myth fails to take seriously the substantial differences between it and the Philippians passage.^[13] Although this solution therefore cannot be regarded as acceptable, it would nevertheless be a grave mistake to ignore Käsemann's point that in the literature of the Hellenistic religions morphē theou and isotheos physis “are parallel and even become synonymous.”^[14]

Dissatisfaction with approaches that rely heavily on either the classical philosophical usage (Lightfoot) or the usage in Hellenistic religions (Käsemann) has led many scholars to reconsider the Jewish background, especially the LXX material, as the most promising source for arriving at a solution. Unfortunately, the LXX evidence is meager and ambiguous, so that interpreters have come up with a wide range of ideas: from the rather vague notion of “visible appearance,”^[15] to the very specific equation of morphē with doxa, “glory” (so Meyer and many after him), and on to the elaboration of an Adam-Christology based on the relation between morphē theou and eikōn tou theou, “image of God” (Col. 1:15).^[16] The discussion of LXX backgrounds is often complicated by fuzzy linguistic arguments and by the implication that the various theses proposed are mutually exclusive.

In view of the great variety of contexts in which morphē may be used, Hawthorne makes a significant point in admitting that the word’s “precise meaning is elusive” (unfortunately, he then proceeds to adopt the precise definition in MM). To put it differently, morphē is characterized by semantic extension;^[17] it covers a broad range of meanings and therefore we are heavily dependent on the immediate context to discover its specific nuance. Here in Phil. 2:6 we are greatly helped by two factors. In the first place, we have the correspondence of morphē theou with isa theō. Käsemann, as we have noticed, was absolutely right in emphasizing that being “in the form of God” is equivalent to being “equal with God.” To go beyond this equivalence and inquire whether morphē tells us precisely in what respects Jesus is equal with God (in essence? attributes? attitude? appearance?) is asking too much from one word.

In the second place, and most important, morphē theou is set in antithetical parallelism to μορφὴν δούλου (morphēn doulou, form of a servant),^[18] an expression further defined by the phrase ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπων (en homoiōmati anthrōpōn, in the likeness of men). It is possible to cite parallels in which morphē is used to designate what is distinctively divine in contrast to what is distinctively human (cf. BDAG 659, s.v. μορφή).^[19] It appears then that Lightfoot (1868: 133), although misguided in seeing here a more or less philosophical meaning of “essence,” was not off the track in detecting a contrast between “the true divine nature of our Lord” and “true human nature.” And it moreover follows that the Philippians passage, although not written for the purpose of presenting an ontological description of Christ, is very much consonant with the trinitarian formulas of the fourth-century church.

These conclusions, however, do not preclude several other ideas that have been put forward over the years. I would not want to argue strongly for them, but it seems misleading to present them as mutually exclusive of each other. For example, the meaning “condition” or “status” is not clearly attested for morphē, but the combination morphēn doulou in verse 7 plus the parallel in 2 Cor. 8:9 strongly suggest that connotation. Again, it is an overstatement to equate morphē with doxa, but one can hardly deny that the morphē theou manifests itself in glory. Finally, the parallel with Adam has been illegitimately pressed by some writers, but there is an undeniable network of associations between Phil. 2 and Gen. 1–3 (mediated by such passages as Rom. 5:19; 8:29; 1 Cor. 15:41; 2 Cor. 3:18; 4:4; Phil. 3:21; Col. 1:15; 3:10), and Ridderbos (1975: 68–78) in particular has shown the theological coherence of these associations.^[20]

b. Christ’s voluntary act negatively stated (v. 6b–c). The ambiguous phrase in verse 6, οὐχ ἄρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο (ouch harpagmon hēgēsato), has created a literature far more extensive than it probably deserves. In particular, one is impressed by the futility of trying to reach a decision regarding Jesus’s preexistence and deity on the basis of whether harpagmon here has an active or a passive meaning.^[21] The subsequent choices then become rather confusing: if one opts for the passive idea, is the nuance positive (“windfall,” advantage”) or negative (“booty, prize”)? Further, if it carries a negative nuance, we must decide whether it speaks of (a) a thing already possessed, which one is tempted to hold on to (res rapta), or (b) a thing not possessed, which one may be tempted to snatch (res rapienda). In the last instance, the inference is drawn that the Christ-hymn speaks of the human (not preexistent) Christ, who was tempted to snatch the status of lordship but instead chose the path of obedience (vv. 9–11). We may outline these options thus:

- I. Active (or abstract: the act of snatching, robbery, usurpation):
“Precisely because he was in the form of God, he reckoned equality with God not as a matter of getting but of giving.”
- II. Passive (or concrete: the thing possessed or to be snatched):
 - A. Positive (windfall, piece of good luck): “Jesus did not regard equality with God as a gain to be utilized.”
 - B. Negative (booty, prize)

1. Res rapta: “He, though existing before the worlds in the form of God, did not treat his equality with God as a prize, a treasure to be greedily clutched and ostentatiously displayed.”
2. Res rapienda: “He did not regard the being on an equality with God as a thing to be seized, violently snatched.”[\[22\]](#)

This very diversity of interpretations should warn us not to move from the ambiguous word to the meaning of the passage as a whole, but vice versa. Now the context provides two important clues. First, the phrase in question is contrasted with ἐαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν (heauton ekenōsen, he emptied himself, v. 7) and ἐταπείνωσεν ἑαυτόν (etapeinōsen heauton, he humbled himself, v. 8). One could argue, on that ground alone, that verse 6 is simply concerned to state negatively what the main verbs in verses 7–8 state positively: Jesus refused to make a selfish choice with respect to his divinity. If so, any other questions regarding the phrase should probably remain quite subordinate. In the second place, it is certainly no accident that the verb hēgeomai is also used in verse 3, and this fact alerts us to the parallel expressions, “each of you must regard one another as more important than himself” and “looking out . . . for the interests of others.” These clauses in turn are contrasted with eritheia, “selfishness.” Third, a more distant—but as we have already noted very important—parallel is Rom. 15:1–7; in verse 3 of that passage we are told that “Christ did not please himself.” These three pieces of contextual data leave no doubt about the force of verse 6b–c: Christ refused to act selfishly.

Whether Christ’s unselfishness expressed itself in a decision not to aspire for something greater than he already had (res rapienda) or in a decision not to use selfishly what he already had (res rapta) can be decided on the basis of three factors. First, the presence of the article in to einai isa theō suggests strongly the definiteness that in English is more commonly expressed with the possessive pronoun (cf. Smyth 1956: §1121), “his equality with God”; at the very least it points back to en morphē theou hyparchōn (so Hawthorne).

Second, an extensive and persuasive discussion by Roy W. Hoover (1971) has demonstrated the mistake of focusing on the word harpagmos itself rather than on the combination of that word (and comparable nouns) with hēgeomai (and comparable verbs). Building on the research of W. W. Jaeger (who however stressed the idea of “windfall”), Hoover states that in all instances examined, the “idiomatic expression refers to something already present and at one’s disposal.” His translation of the Phil. 2:6 passage is: Christ “did not regard being equal with God as . . . something to use for his own advantage” (Hoover 1971: 118). This essay, which reflects thoroughness and a clear-headed method, must be regarded as having settled this particular question.[23]

Third, the notion of Christ’s aspiring (or being tempted to aspire) for equality with God is completely foreign to the NT; conversely, the notion that Christ set aside his “advantageous” position for the sake of others is at the very heart of the NT message (cf. again 2 Cor. 8:9).

c. Christ’s voluntary act positively stated (vv. 7–8). The central thought of the whole Christ-hymn is embodied in the two main verbs, ekenōsen and etapeinōsen, which illuminate each other. It is specious to drive a sharp wedge between these verbs; only a wooden approach to this poetic passage would insist that the verbs refer to two different and separate stages. It may well be, of course, that the first verb speaks of the incarnation generally whereas the second focuses more specifically on Jesus’s death, but one would be greatly mistaken to suggest that the self-emptying is not part of the humiliation or—what is more to the point—that Jesus’s humiliation unto death is not included in the statement “he emptied himself.”

These preliminary comments alone should make us suspicious of the extensive debates seeking to answer the question “Of what did Christ empty himself?” Once again, sensitivity to the contextual demands of the passage should discourage us from focusing excessively on the meaning of one word. As Vincent aptly puts it, heauton ekenōsen is used as a “graphic expression of the completeness of his self-renunciation. It includes all the details of humiliation which follow, and is defined by these. Further definition belongs to speculative theology.”[24]

Moreover, the well-established figurative meaning of the verb, “to nullify, make of no effect,” is elsewhere used by Paul and suits the present passage well. For example, in Rom. 4:14 Paul states that “if those who are of the Law are heirs, faith has been emptied” (kekenōtai hē pistis), but no one thinks of asking, “Of what is faith made empty?” Clearly, the idea is that faith would come to nought, as the following clause confirms: “and the promise has been nullified” (kai katērgētai hē epangelia). Similar examples are found in 1 Cor. 1:17; 9:15; 2 Cor. 9:3.[25]

In short, we are fully justified in translating our phrase with a comparable English idiom: “he made himself nothing” (cf. NIV). Whether or not the phrase focuses on the initial act of humiliation (“he became flesh,” John 1:14), it surely points forward to his death. In other words, the phrase is intended to encapsulate for the readers the whole descent of Christ from highest glory to lowest depths.[26]

In addition to the two main verbs ekenōsen and etapeinōsen, verses 7–8 contain four participial clauses that modify either or both of the verbs. How should these four participles be related to the main thought? All four are aorists (labōn, genomenos, heuretheis, genomenos), and aorist participles usually refer to actions that have taken place prior to the action of the verbs they modify.[27] If we were to press this rule, we would need to translate each clause somewhat woodenly: for example, “having taken (or, after he had taken) the form of a servant.” This grammatical “rule,” however, admits of many exceptions, and most writers recognize that some flexibility is needed here, particularly in view of the poetic quality of the passage.

The smoothest option, followed by NASB and NIV, is to translate the first three participles as referring to simultaneous action. The NASB then interprets the fourth explicitly as a participle of means: “by becoming obedient.” Implicitly, however, the first two clauses also indicate means: “by taking the form of a servant, by being made in the likeness of men.” Hawthorne takes even the third participial clause in this way (“by being recognized as a man”), but the resulting syntax is awkward, because it requires that the first three participles modify the first verb. In both of the strophic arrangements that have won most acceptance, the third participial clause is connected with the second main verb, etapeinōsen, and that seems the most natural reading of the clause, that is, as providing the background for the statement of verse 8.

Much more difficult is the decision whether the second participial clause —“being made in the likeness of men”—should be construed with what precedes, as in Lohmeyer’s arrangement, or with what follows, as in Jeremias’s proposal. Since both strophic arrangements are plausible and at the same time speculative, we must make a judgment on other grounds. Jeremias (1963: 85, following Dibelius) argues forcefully that en homoiōmati anthropōn genomenos must not be separated from kai schēmati heuretheis hōs anthrōpos because both clauses have substantives that end in -ma, each of which attests to Christ’s humanity. This argument is hardly decisive, however. Besides, the resulting idea does not yield a particularly good sense: if the stanza begins with “being made in the likeness of men,” what significance do we attribute to the additional clause, “and being found in appearance as a man”?

On the other hand, if we construe the second participial clause with what precedes, a clear progression of thought results. According to this approach, the clause “taking the form of a servant” is expanded and explained by “being made in the likeness of men.” Once that point has been clearly established, a transition is marked by the conjunction kai (and) so that the clause “being found in appearance as a man,” by summarizing the previous thought, introduces or sets the stage for the next main verb, etapeinōsen.

The exegetical significance of these considerations is, first, that we need not see a sharp difference between the first two clauses. The words morphē and homoiōma, whatever distinctions one may detect in some contexts, are interchanged here for stylistic rather than semantic reasons. Moreover, we need not look for substantive theological differences between doulos and anthrōpos; the first term of course stresses Christ’s attitude of servanthood, but the latter simply reminds us that he gave expression to that attitude by becoming man (cf. Rom. 8:3). In the second place, it becomes clear that the use of schēma is not intended primarily to be contrasted with morphē (as Lightfoot tried to prove). Rather, the whole clause recapitulates the thrust of the two previous clauses by making a succinct statement of the incarnation. As the NBE puts it, “Así, presentándose como simple hombre . . .” (“Thus, presenting himself as no more than man . . .”).

Special attention needs to be given, finally, to the last participial clause, “becoming obedient to death.”^[28] The description of Christ as “obedient” (hypēkoos) will serve as a key word in relating Christ’s humiliation to the Philippians’ conduct (hypēkousate, v. 12). The terminology of obedience is common enough in Paul, but only on one other occasion, Rom. 5:19, does he use it to describe Jesus’s conduct: “For as through one man’s disobedience [parakoēs, parallel to paraptōmatos, transgression, in v. 18] the many were constituted sinners, so also through one man’s obedience [hypakoēs, parallel to dikaiōmatos, act of righteousness, in v. 18] the many will be constituted righteous” (Jesus is also described as learning obedience in Heb. 5:8). While we need to be careful not to import into Philippians, on the basis of one word, all of the theological ideas presented in Romans, the parallel is real and throws light in two directions.

First, it adds weight to the suspicions that the Adam-Christ analogy, although not dominant in the Christ-hymn, has played a role in it (see the comments on v. 6a). Second, it reminds us that Paul can hardly speak of Christ's death without thinking of its redemptive effect. In other words, although the Christ-hymn speaks of Jesus's death primarily in reference to Christ's humiliation, so that its main purpose is not to make a statement about its sacrificial character, yet the latter cannot be wrenched from the total meaning of the text.^[29] Surely, both for Paul and for his readers, Christ's death was not only an example of utter obedience and humiliation, but also the very basis on which the believer's sanctification (sōtēria, v. 12) could become a reality.

But why is one more clause added, thanatou de staurou (and death of the cross)? No doubt to emphasize the extent and depth of Christ's humiliation, because death by crucifixion was considered by the Romans the most degrading penalty. (Philippian criminals, if sentenced to death, would have been treated more honorably as Roman citizens, for whom decapitation was the capital punishment.) There is more, however. The way Paul speaks of the cross (e.g., 1 Cor. 1:17–18; Gal. 3:1, 13; 6:12–14) has led many scholars to conclude that the manner of Christ's death may have been the major stumbling block for Paul prior to his conversion (e.g., Bruce 1977: 70–71; on the symbolic significance of the cross for Paul, see Williams 2002).

The offensive character of that death repelled many pious Jews and may have been a source of embarrassment for Jewish Christians. Paul viewed his Jewish opponents as wanting to avoid the offense of the cross (Gal. 6:12); indeed, in Phil. 3:18 he describes them as “enemies of the cross.” We may have in the Christ-hymn a subtle anticipation of the polemic of chapter 3. It is certainly intriguing that the clause thanatou de staurou in 2:8 breaks the poetic pattern of all major strophic arrangements of the passage. We may speculate that in fact Paul was making use of a well-known hymn but then inserted this clause to impart his own distinctiveness to it and to reinforce one of his major concerns in writing this letter. (If there is any merit to this suggestion, which in one form or another has been adopted by not a few writers, we have an additional reason for affirming the integrity of the epistle; see introduction, “Literary Integrity.”)

3. Christ's Exaltation (2:9–11)

The second part of the Christ-hymn contrasts with the first, not only conceptually (exaltation opposed to humiliation), but in other respects as well. To begin with, in this second part we are not faced with numerous lexical and exegetical problems such as we encountered in verses 6–8. Indeed, most commentators are able to deal with verses 9–11 in about half the space they required for the first section. (Yet, as we shall see, these verses raise two or three questions that have major doctrinal implications.) Moreover, the structure of verses 9–11 is not characterized by the large number of parallel and contrasting items that have been recognized in verses 6–8.

Verses 9–11 constitute one sentence, composed of (1) two closely related main verbs, ὑπερύψωσεν (hyperypsōsen, exalted) and ἐχαρίσατο (echarisato, granted), of which God, not Jesus, is the subject; and (2) a purpose clause (introduced with ἵνα, hina, in order that) also consisting of two verbs, the subjunctives κάμψη (kampsē, bow) and ἐξομολογήσεται (exomologēsētai, confess). This sentence is introduced in verse 9 with the inferential conjunction διό (dio, therefore) reinforced with καί (kai, also; see the first additional note on 2:9), and commentators have debated the precise relationship between the two parts of the hymn.

On the surface, it would appear that God is spoken of as rewarding Jesus with “the name that is above every name” because of his faithful obedience (so Meyer; Eadie 1859: 121; et al.). Partly because of certain abuses of this idea, Calvin reacted strongly against it. In recent times it has been opposed by Barth (1962: 66) and others; Collange, for example, appeals to the verb echarisato as indicating “pure grace” or “the gracious sovereign act of God,” in contrast to the idea of recompense. Hawthorne (1983: 90) speaks of a “natural or logical outcome,” “an inflexible law of God’s kingdom,” namely, “that in the divine order of things self-humbling leads inevitably to exaltation” (cf. Lohmeyer 1928: 47–48).

One must question, however, whether it is useful to oppose these various aspects to one another. The “inflexible law” of which Hawthorne speaks is hardly an impersonal rule; when Jesus taught that “whoever humbles himself shall be exalted” (Matt. 23:12), he was not speaking of an automatic sequence of events but of a deliberate act on God’s part, as we also have here in Philippians. God’s act does not entail submission to some higher, arbitrary law. In other words, to speak of a logical consequence does not exclude the question of whether or not a personal reward is in view.

Moreover, is it necessary to deny the notion of reward if we wish to do justice to the gracious element of God's act? The question, though quickly dismissed in some Protestant circles as reflecting a medieval aberration, is complex and does not admit of brief and definitive answers. On the one hand, if we emphasize the reward/merit element in a passage that presents Christ as our example, we may appear to undermine the doctrine of salvation by grace (as though people achieve their final salvation as Christ achieved his messianic exaltation). On the other hand, if we emphasize the element of grace in a passage where Christ's vicarious obedience is in view, we appear to undermine a correlative soteriological principle, namely, that Christ's meritorious work as the last Adam fully satisfied the claims of divine law and justice (Rom. 5:18–19; cf. Kline 1983: 87).

It may help us to see our way out of this dilemma if we consider, first, that the Christ-hymn, though it certainly describes Christ's sacrificial work, does not have as its primary object setting forth the vicarious character of his obedience. In other words, we need not fear that an emphasis on the gracious character of God's act in exalting Jesus subverts the principle of Christ's meritorious obedience on behalf of his people. Second, the Christ-hymn implies a correspondence between Christ's experience and the believer's sanctification leading to glorification, not between Christ's exaltation and the sinner's justification. Surely, believers are exhorted to persevere in their Christian race so that they may receive the prize (Phil. 3:13–14), but we need not for that reason fear that the notion of reward conflicts with Paul's doctrine of justification (Rom. 4:5, "to the one who does not work . . .").

Gnilka (1976: 125) then is quite correct in pointing out both that we cannot exclude the notion of reward from this passage and at the same time that we must restrict its application in view of Jesus's uniqueness (though Gnilka's own qualifications are debatable). Similarly, Martin (1997: 232) clarifies the issue by accepting in this context the concept of reward while rejecting that of merit:

It is not so much the thought that because He rendered this obedience He was glorified as that, having accomplished the mission He came into the world to fulfil, God interposed and reversed the seeming finality of death in raising Him to the place of dignity. The obedience of Christ did not force the hand of God, as a doctrine of merit implies. The action of God is but the other side of that obedience, and a vindication of all that the obedience involved.

We must move on and inquire what is the nature of Christ's exaltation. It is not far-fetched to view the second kai of verse 9 as epexegetic; certainly Christ's exaltation is here defined as receiving "the name which is above every name." But what is that name? Most contemporary writers assume that this name (ὄνομα, onoma) is in fact the title κύριος (kyrios, Lord). This interpretation makes sense in view of verse 11 and may well be correct, but it requires some critical comments.

1. The equation of onoma with kyrios is an inference, not an explicit statement in the text.
2. Although the phrase epi [or en] tō onomati tinos may indicate a title or category (cf. Heitmüller 1903: 50), we may question whether "title" is an adequate equivalent for the absolute use of onoma, as in verse 9.
[30]
3. To take the genitive Iēsou in verse 10 as indicating possession (the name that belongs to Jesus = Lord) is at variance with usage.[31]
4. Although Greek onoma, like its Hebrew counterpart שֵׁם (šēm), often calls attention to the honor and dignity of the bearer (cf. Lightfoot), one must question the approach that focuses exclusively on this aspect and suggests that onoma here does not mean "name" but rather "office and power" (Martin 1997: 236).

All of these are substantive objections that lead us to doubt the standard interpretation. It would be an overreaction, however, to argue that onoma in verse 9 is a reference to Jesus and not to Lord, for the connection between these two names is too close and basic. Very helpful in this regard is noticing the combination onoma kyriou Iēsou in Acts 8:16; 19:5, 13, 17; 21:13; Col. 3:17 (cf. also 1 Cor. 5:4; 2 Thess. 1:12; 3:6). Moule (1970: 270) gives us a satisfactory statement:

God, in the incarnation, bestowed upon the one who is on an equality with him an earthly name which . . . has come to be, in fact, the highest of names, because service and self-giving are themselves the highest of divine attributes. Because of the incarnation, the human name, "Jesus," is acclaimed as the highest name; and the Man Jesus thus comes to be acclaimed as Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

Moule rightly appeals to Eph. 1:20–23, where Christ's exaltation is described as his being seated above all powers and above "every name that is named" (hyperanō . . . pantos onomatos onomazomenou), with all things brought under his authority (cf. also Matt. 28:18). It should be noted, finally, that the idea of a new significance given to Christ's name in connection with his exaltation may be present also in Rom. 1:3–4 and Heb. 1:3–4 (with reference to huios, son; cf. Silva 1976–77).

One additional problem needs to be considered in connection with the twofold purpose clause in verses 10–11, namely, whether the homage spoken of is voluntary or involuntary. Calvin rightly comments that the devils, for example, “are not, and never will be, subject of their own accord and by cheerful submission; but Paul is not speaking here of voluntary obedience.” Hawthorne finds this view objectionable, claiming that (1) the subjunctive exomologēsētai does not allow this interpretation, which would require the inferior reading in the indicative mood, (2) not even God's purposes are always fulfilled, and (3) the passage only expresses God's hope that intelligent beings will voluntarily choose submission.

We may respond to these points in order.

1. The weight that Hawthorne places on hina plus subjunctive is unbearable. John 3:16, for example, uses this construction (hina pas ho pisteuōn eis auton mē apolētai all' echē zōēn aiōnion), but who will argue that God only hopes that those who believe will not perish? The certainty that God will give eternal life to all who believe is not undermined by the subjunctive verbs apolētai and echē. In any case, the grammatical category that we call the subjunctive mood cannot of itself convey assurance or lack thereof (certainly not any more than the English construction “in order that” can settle those kinds of questions).
2. Hawthorne equivocates on the term “purpose,” which sometimes can refer to God's commands, as in Luke 7:30, a passage to which he appeals (the Pharisees “rejected God's purpose [boulē]”). Contrast such a passage as Isa. 46:10, “My purpose will stand, and I will do all that I please” (NIV; note also 14:24–27). The question is then whether Phil. 2:11 speaks of what God merely hopes people will do or of what he, by divine decree, has granted to the Son, namely, the placing of all things under his feet (Eph. 1:22).
3. Statements that point to the eschatological purposes of God are always characterized by firmness and certainty.^[32] Of particular importance here is Paul's affirmation that, when the end comes, all powers will be abolished and all things will be subjected to Christ (1 Cor. 15:24–28). Moreover, Phil. 2:10–11 is virtually a quotation of Isa. 45:23 LXX (which Paul cites verbatim in Rom. 14:11), a passage that rings with triumphal certainty concerning the sovereign Lordship of God over all. It is only natural, however, that the manner in which this submission is expressed here focuses on the thankful praise of God’s people.

In conclusion, we must pause to appreciate the stunning implications of applying Isa. 45:23 to Jesus. Isaiah 45:18–25 (excerpted below from the literal NASB) constitutes one of the most powerful OT affirmations of the uniqueness of the God of Israel in the context of his redeeming work:

I am the Lord [Yahweh], and there is none else. . . .
They have no knowledge,
Who carry about their wooden idol,
And pray to a god who cannot save. . . .
. . . there is no other God besides Me,
A righteous God and a Savior;
There is none except Me.
Turn to Me, and be saved, all the ends of the earth;
For I am God, and there is no other.
I have sworn by Myself, . . .
That to Me every knee will bow, every tongue will swear allegiance.

Whether or not Paul composed the Christ-hymn, it patently expresses his own conviction that the worship of Jesus Christ does not compromise Israel’s monotheistic faith. On the contrary, Jesus Christ the righteous Savior bears the name of the one Lord, Yahweh, “to the glory of God the Father.”[\[33\]](#)

Additional Notes

2:5. τοῦτο φρονεῖτε (lit., think this): Two interesting textual variants should be noted. The Majority text reads τοῦτο γάρ, whereas the omission of γάρ is the clear Alexandrian reading. One does not expect a causal particle introducing an exhortation. Indeed, an examination of comparable clauses in Paul shows that in no instance does the verb have to be understood as imperatival and that in only three instances is it possible to understand it that way (1 Cor. 1:26; Eph. 5:5; 1 Thess. 2:9). Metzger (1994: 545, supported by Heriban 1983: 86n) therefore misleads when he comments that “no good reason can be found for its deletion.” If anything, an inferential conjunction would be natural; not surprisingly, the improved reading οὖν (therefore) is found in a few medieval manuscripts. Inasmuch as the Majority text is characterized by grammatically smooth readings, how then does one explain this γάρ here? It must be original, as seems confirmed by the additional support it receives from the weighty combination of P⁴⁶ and the “Western” text. The omission can then be explained as either accidental (see introduction, “Textual History”) or as an early Alexandrian attempt to improve the style.

The second variation is the third-person passive imperative φρονείσθω, also found in the Majority text. In this case, however, there is no support from the other textual traditions, and the variation can be easily explained as an attempt to smooth out what was probably perceived as a syntactical irregularity (cf. Lightfoot). UBS⁴ does not even list this variant, which is rejected by virtually all authorities. Hawthorne’s attempt to resurrect it is surprising and unsuccessful (see the comments on 2:5 above and note 4).

2:6. ὅς: On the analogy of 1 Tim. 3:16, this relative pronoun is often thought to be an introductory formula for early christological hymns, but see Fee 1995: 41–42 and Brucker 1997: 312.

2:6. ὑπάρχων (existing): The NASB is justified in bringing out the concessive force of the participle (contra Meyer, Hawthorne), and that in turn sheds light on the second part of verse 6. It seems unnecessary to see any special significance in the use of ὑπάρχω (as opposed to εἰμί).

2:6. ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ: Lightfoot’s claim that μορφή (opposite σχῆμα) refers to unchangeable essence can be sustained by some references, but too many passages speak against it. Plato asks if God can manifest himself in different aspects (ἄλλαις ιδέαις) and alter “his shape in many transformations” (τὸ αὐτοῦ εἶδος εἰς πολλὰς μορφάς). Xenophon reports Socrates’ advice not to wait “for the gods to appear to you in bodily presence” (τὰς μορφὰς τῶν θεῶν ἴδης). Philo describes Gaius’s attempts to prove himself divine “by remodelling and recasting what was nothing but a single body into manifold forms” (ἐνὸς σώματος οὐσίαν μετασχηματίζων καὶ μεταχαράττων εἰς πολυτρόπους μορφάς). Lucian relates the Egyptian story of a certain occasion when one god “in his terror entered into a goat, another into a ram, and others into other beasts or birds; so of course the gods still keep the forms they took then” (διὸ δὴ εἰσέτι καὶ νῦν φυλάττεσθαι τὰς τότε μορφὰς τοῖς θεοῖς). Elsewhere Lucian describes the ugly physical appearance of the god Heracles (τὸ εἶδος τοῦ θεοῦ) according to the Celts, who thereby committed an offense against his form (παρανομεῖν τοὺς Κελτοὺς ἐς τὴν μορφήν τὴν Ἑρακλέους). A still later writer, Libanius (fourth century), states that “any man who really approximates to the divine, does so not by any physical likeness” (οὐχ ὁ τοῖς θεοῖς τὴν μορφήν ὁμοίως).[34]

2:6. οὐχ ἀρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο (lit., did not regard as robbery): It may be that too much emphasis has been placed on this negative statement, with the implication that Christ was tempted but refused to yield. My former student Glen Ker (in personal communication) has suggested that the οὐχ . . . ἀλλά contrast is used here for rhetorical effect: the particle οὐχ could be viewed as negating the whole clause (not the verb alone), with the resulting idea, “We should not think that he regarded. . . .” Still another possibility is that οὐχ governs not the verb but the noun, as Carmignac has argued with erudition but unpersuasively.[35]

2:6. τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ (lit., the being equal to God): The fact that ἴσα can be described grammatically as a “weakened” adverbial form of the adjective ἴσος has misled some scholars (e.g., Gnllka 1976: 117) into thinking that this phrase cannot refer to complete equality with God. The most thorough attempt to establish this view is by Grelot (1972).[36] The confusion shows up especially when a scholar states: “The fact that ἴσων . . . is not employed suggests that ‘being equal with god’ does not denote an equality of persons” (Wanamaker 1987: 187). No doubt if the text did use the adjectival form, someone would point to Matt. 20:12 (and probably other texts) as proof that even ἴσος need not refer to complete equality of nature. Theological inferences drawn from grammatical nuances (and in a quasi-poetic passage to boot) seldom are worth considering seriously.

2:7. ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν (lit., emptied himself): The view taken here—namely, that this phrase should be understood figuratively—is objected to by Oepke on the basis that a metaphorical meaning “is ruled out by the resultant weak tautology of” ἐταπείνωσεν ἑαυτόν (TDNT 3:661). Even if we allowed that the latter clause is equivalent to the former, Oepke’s objection is strange when one considers the “tautology of earnestness” that characterizes 2:1–11 (see introduction, “Language and Style”).

But if our interpretation is correct, what are we to say then about the large number of attempts to explain the phrase? Martin (1997: 169–94) catalogs seven distinct interpretations, most of which can be plausibly defended. As noted above (see the discussion of μορφή θεοῦ in the comments on 2:6–8), we can and should recognize that the phrase ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν may well have evoked a larger network of associations, and those would be part of the “total” meaning. Particularly intriguing is the possible connection with Isa. 53:12, where the Servant of the Lord (cf. δοῦλος in Phil. 2:7) is said to have “poured (out) himself [lit., his soul] unto death.” The fact that Phil. 2:11 quotes Isa. 45:23 increases the probability that we may have an allusion to Isa. 53:12. But an allusion is not a direct reference.^[37] To say that the Christ-hymn is primarily an attribution to Jesus of the Servant of the Lord description seems to me to be an overstatement; also unpersuasive is the view that “he emptied himself” refers to the death of the Servant of the Lord (as argued emphatically by Gundry 1994: 290–93).

In similar fashion, we may want to dispute that the passage speaks primarily to ontological issues regarding the nature of the Trinity, but it would appear futile to deny that Phil. 2:5–7 has some strong implications for these issues. These verses cannot serve as the total basis for a formula regarding the two natures of Christ, but the description of Christ in this passage reflects certain ontological commitments that lead rather naturally to the later orthodox formulations.

2:7. ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπων γενόμενος (lit., having become in the likeness of men; which I have paraphrased above with “by becoming incarnate” to stress the connection of this clause with what precedes): The variant ἄνθρωπον (℣⁴⁶ supported by some versional and patristic evidence) instead of the plural form is surely not to be explained on the basis of theological motivation, but as a simple assimilation to the singular δοῦλον, reinforced by ὡς ἄνθρωπος. This kind of scribal error is common in ℣⁴⁶ (see introduction, “Textual History”; in the course of writing this section of the commentary, I have made the same mistake several times).

2:7. μορφήν . . . ὁμοιώματι . . . σχήματι: The literature dealing with these words (and such related terms as δόξα, εἶδος, εἰκών, etc.) is very extensive and covers a wide range of problems.^[38] Whatever distinctions may be posited are subject to contextual adjustments, including semantic neutralization, which is most likely what we have here. It would be difficult to prove that if these three terms were interchanged, a substantive semantic difference would result. No doubt μορφή was chosen first to provide an explicit contrast with μορφή θεοῦ in verse 6; ὁμοίωμα (a close synonym to ἴσος, cf. ἴσα in v. 6) serves to delimit more precisely the range of μορφή (that is, although μορφή covers a very wide semantic range, only that area that overlaps with ὁμοίωμα is in view); finally σχῆμα, which has an even greater range than μορφή, is perhaps the most useful term available to provide a general summary of what the two previous clauses have stated.

2:9. διὸ καί: The precise nuance of this combination of particles is debatable. Lightfoot simply states that the καί “implies reciprocation”; the resultant idea, presumably, would be, “As for God, this is what he did in response.” Vincent claims that the καί expresses “the consequence corresponding to the humiliation.” BDAG 250 describes the force of this combination in its various occurrences by saying that it denotes “that the inference is self-evident,” but the passages do not bear this out. Is such an inference self-evident in Rom. 4:22, which has διὸ καί, but not in Rom. 1:24, which has διό alone? In any case, this construction is not an adequate basis for Hawthorne’s view of a “natural or logical outcome.” The inherent difficulties in trying to identify a precise meaning for this expression, combined with the consideration that in a (semi-)poetic passage other factors (such as rhythm) may have influenced the writer, lead us to see the καί simply as strengthening or enhancing the διό (so Lohmeyer). The force of the expression is surely equivalent to that of διὰ τοῦτο in Isa. 53:12 LXX; the contrast between suffering and vindication in that passage may well have had some influence on the composition of the hymn, as pointed out earlier.

2:9. ὑπερύψωσεν: This compound form, if its etymology is pressed, conveys a comparative meaning: “God exalted him more.” This has led some writers to speculate concerning what is the basis of the comparison, and a common answer is that God has now exalted Christ to a higher dignity than he enjoyed in his preincarnate existence (v. 6; cf. Martin 1997: 239–40). Whether or not the conception is valid, it seems rather foreign to the text. At best, the verb may anticipate ὑπὲρ πάντων ὀνομάτων, “above every name” (Delling 1969: 147). At any rate, BDAG lists more than forty ὑπερ-compounds, the vast majority of which are translated as elatives (e.g., ὑπεραυξάνω, increase abundantly, 2 Thess. 1:3) or as superlatives (e.g., ὑπερεκπερυσσῶς, most highly, 1 Thess. 5:13). The translation of Phil. 2:9 in BDAG (1034, s.v. ὑπερυψόω, meaning a) is quite defensible: “raise . . . to the loftiest height.”

2:10. ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ: The NASB and NIV rendering, “at the name of Jesus,” could be interpreted to mean that (the name of) Jesus is the object of worship (so Hawthorne) or that worship should take place when his name is uttered (Moule 1970: 270). Some commentators argue that we have here the language of prayer and that a literal translation, “in the name of Jesus,” properly calls attention to Jesus’s mediating role (so Beare 1959: 86–87). This last option, however, would not necessarily exclude the idea that Jesus is also the object of worship, as the context clearly indicates. Vincent’s more general interpretation is perhaps the most satisfactory:

He who believes on the name of the Lord believes on the Lord himself. Hence, to bow the knee in the name of Jesus is to pay adoration in that sphere of authority, grace and glory for which the name stands; as being consciously within the kingdom of which he is Lord, as recognising the rightfulness of the title “Jesus,” “Savior,” “Lord,” and as loyally accepting the obligations which those titles imply.

Cf. also H. Kennedy (1897–1910: 439): “This name, which declares the true character and dignity of Jesus Christ, is both the basis and the object of worship.”

2:10. ἐπουρανίων καὶ ἐπιγείων καὶ καταχθονίων (of those who are in heaven, and on earth, and under the earth): We would be misguided to attempt an identification of three specific groups.^[39] Paul's purpose is clearly to stress the universality of Christ's lordship. Lightfoot is therefore right in denying that the reference is limited to intelligent beings. A lack of literal knees and tongues does not prevent the heavens from proclaiming God's glory (Ps. 19:1–6; cf. Ps. 148), and Paul himself was capable of a bold personification of inanimate nature (Rom. 8:19–22).

2:11. ἑξομολογήσεται: An impressive combination of Alexandrian (A C), "Western" (D F G), and Byzantine witnesses have the indicative ἑξομολογήσεται, which if pressed would indicate a grammatical break from the ἵνα clause, with the resulting translation: "and every tongue will confess." Grammatically, therefore, the indicative is the more difficult reading, and it is quite possible that an original indicative, perceived by scribes as an irregularity, led to the smoothing of the style through the very minor (semi-conscious?) change from an ε to an η.^[40] If the indicative is indeed original, however, it would not in my opinion convey greater certainty than the purpose clause (see the comments on 2:11).

2:11. εἰς δόξαν θεοῦ πατρός: Clearly, the worship of Jesus as Lord does not imply competition with the Father, who receives even greater glory through the glorification of the Son.

- III. A Call to Sanctification (1:27–2:30)
 - A. Christian Citizenship (1:27–2:4)
 - B. Christian Humility (2:5–11)
 - C. Christian Obedience (2:12–18)
 - D. Resumption of Paul's Missionary Report (2:19–30)

C. Christian Obedience (2:12–18)

The connection that obtains between the Christ-hymn and its surrounding context is made clear by verse 8. The first part of that verse emphasizes Christ's humility (ἐταπείνωσεν, etapeinōsen), a concept that links the Christ-hymn very closely with the immediately preceding section (ταπεινοφροσύνη, tapeinophrosynē, v. 3). But this self-humbling is further described in verse 8 as an act of obedience (ὑπήκοος, hypēkoos), and this concept, now picked up in verse 12 (ὑπηκούσατε, hypēkousate, you have obeyed), becomes the central thrust of verses 12–18.

When one further considers the strong link provided by ὥστε (hōste, therefore) in verse 12, one must wonder how anyone could deny that in verses 6–11 Jesus is indeed viewed as our ethical example. In addition, as several commentators have noted, the theme of Paul's presence/absence links verse 12 with 1:27. Quite possibly, then, the hōste not only serves as a transition from what immediately precedes but also resumes the call to Christian citizenship, that is, unity in the struggle for the faith.

The structure of verses 12–18 is clear. We have first a general but powerful exhortation and encouragement to lead obedient lives (vv. 12–13). There follows a more specific instruction to avoid dissension in the community (vv. 14–16). Paul then concludes with an appeal to his own ministry (vv. 17–18). Thus the exegesis will be based on the following outline:

1. The believer's work (2:12–13)
2. Blameless children (2:14–16)
3. A personal appeal (2:17–18)

Exegesis and Exposition

¹²Therefore, my loved ones, [in view of Christ's obedience, I call upon you once again to live as Christian citizens:] In the same way that you have always shown an obedient attitude, I urge you to bring about with all godly fear your own salvation—something to be done not only "when" I am present, but much more so now during my absence. ¹³[You may approach this awesome task with confidence] because "God" himself is the one [who makes it possible] by producing in your lives both the will to work and the working itself, and all for the sake of his gracious will.

¹⁴[Let me be more specific: Unlike the Israelites in the wilderness,] you must do everything without grumbling and quarreling. ¹⁵This way [my prayer will be answered:] you will "be" blameless and pure, yes, children of God who live "without reproach" in the midst of crooked and perverse people, among whom you shine like stars in the world ¹⁶by holding fast the word of life. As a result, I will have reason to glory at the day of Christ, [knowing] that I did not run [my spiritual race] in vain nor did I labor in vain.

¹⁷Nevertheless, [you must not think that I regret my toil and pain:] if I should indeed crown the sacrificial service brought about through your faith [or crown my sacrificial service for your faith] by my being poured out as a libation, I still rejoice and share my joy with all of you. ¹⁸In the same way you should rejoice and share your joy with me.

1. The Believer's Work (2:12–13)

This remarkable passage has occasioned considerable controversy, partly because of several distinct exegetical problems. It is no exaggeration, however, to say that our understanding of these two verses hinges on the force of the imperative phrase, τὴν ἑαυτῶν σωτηρίαν κατεργάζεσθε (tēn heautōn sōtērian katergazesthe, bring about your own salvation), which constitutes the main thought of the passage. Verse 12 could be construed as a chiasm (but see the first two additional notes on 2:12):

A hypēkousate (obeyed)

B en tō parousia mou (in my presence)

B' en tō apousia mou (in my absence)

A' katergazesthe (work)

Whether or not we wish to press this structure, we may reasonably deduce that to work one's salvation is a more specific—or at least a more suggestive—way of expressing the idea of obedience.

But what could Paul possibly mean by such an expression? Careful readers of the Pauline letters are brought up short by it, since hardly anything is more fundamental to the apostle's theology than the doctrine that God saves "the one who does not work" (tō mē ergazomenō, Rom. 4:5).

[1] Moreover, by going on to explain that it is God who works, Paul may appear to render the command meaningless. The conceptual tension between verse 12 and verse 13 seems unbearable—apparently, an extreme formulation of the paradox of divine sovereignty and human responsibility.

Beginning with Michael (1928: 98–99), some commentators have sought to put us at ease by arguing that these verses address a sociological rather than a strictly theological issue. In other words, Paul is here concerned with the well-being of the community, not with the question of individual salvation. A number of plausible arguments have been advanced in support of this relatively new interpretation.

In the first place, we are told that ἐν ὑμῖν (en hymin, v. 13) should be translated “among you” rather than “in you.” This rendering is of course quite possible, and we saw how it seemed preferable in verse 5. One must ask, however, how it is that God works in the midst of people if not through personal transformation. To state that the passage refers not to individual salvation but to the church’s well-being already assumes a conceptual dichotomy that is both false and lethal.[2] As we noted in connection with 1:19 and 27, personal sanctification takes place precisely in the context of the Christian community.

As a matter of fact, moreover, it is not at all certain or even probable that in this particular passage en hymin means “among you.” The proper translation depends on the particular syntactical combination being considered. In verse 5 we noted that the combination of this phrase with the verb phroneite most likely means, “think among you,” but a different thrust is apparent when the verb is energeomai. A particularly clear example is 2 Cor. 4:12, “death works [energeitai] in us [en hēmin = Paul], but life in you [en hymin]”; here en hymin must have the same force as en hēmin, and the latter cannot reasonably be translated “among us” (similarly, the verb is used with en + sg. noun/pronoun in Eph. 1:20; Col. 1:29). The translation “works in” for energeō + en + pl. noun is always possible and in at least two passages most probable (Rom. 7:5 and 1 Cor. 12:6).[3]

In the second place, it is argued that sōtēria need not have its technical theological force, because the meaning of “health” is well-attested. It must be objected, however, that out of nearly twenty occurrences of this noun in the Pauline corpus, not one instance requires the translation “well-being”; the vast majority require—and all of them admit—the theological sense. (The nontheological sense “deliverance” is possible in 1:19, but even there “well-being” is not possible; see the comments on that verse and on 1:28.) That the context of 2:12 does not require the sense “well-being”—indeed, that its usual theological sense is preferable—should become clear in the course of our discussion.

Proponents of the new view appeal, thirdly, to the context as not being consonant with the traditional understanding. Martin (1976: 103), for example, states that “after the passage in 2:5–11 it would be inappropriate to stress personal salvation,” but he does not spell out the argument and it is difficult to see its force. Martin also argues that verse 12 “cannot mean that each church member is to concentrate on his own soul’s salvation, since Paul has bidden them to do the opposite in 2:4.” The difficulty with this argument is its suggestion that concern for one’s soul is tantamount to selfishness (which is forbidden in 2:4). On the contrary, Gal. 6:1–5 shows us how easily Paul can move from the need for spiritual self-concern (“looking to yourselves,” v. 1) to concern for others (“bear one another’s burdens,” v. 2) and back again (“let each one examine his own work,” v. 4). More satisfactory is Martin’s appeal to the emphasis of Phil. 2:1–4 and 14 on Christian relationships. But as we shall see, the traditional understanding of verse 12 is hardly inconsistent with such an emphasis.

These arguments, therefore, whether viewed separately or in concert, utterly fail to dislodge the view that verse 12 speaks of personal salvation (though one must again underscore that the personal salvation in view manifests itself primarily in healthy community relationships). Perhaps the strongest objection to the new interpretation is that it lends itself so easily (though not necessarily, cf. Michael 1928: 103–4 on v. 13) to a remarkably weakened reading of a remarkably potent text. Martin, for instance, sees in this passage little more than an apostolic reminder that God’s help is available to the Philippians even if Paul himself cannot be with them. Hawthorne (1983: 106–7), for his part, believes that a good summary of Paul’s teaching is a saying by Aeschylus roughly equivalent to “God helps those who help themselves.”

A better understanding of our passage begins with the recognition that the phrase ὁ ἐνεργῶν ἐν ὑμῖν (ho energōn en hymin, he who works in you) finds a close parallel in 1:6, ὁ ἐναρξάμενος ἐν ὑμῖν ἔργον ἀγαθόν (ho enarxamenos en hymin ergon agathon, he who began a good work in you). In the exegesis of that passage we noticed how easily the apostle moves from a commendation of the Philippians’ own conduct (v. 5) to an acknowledgment that God is the one who both began that good work and will surely complete it (then, just as easily, he shifts back in verse 7 to commend them for their constancy). The striking verbal correspondence between 1:6 and 2:13 suggests strongly that the two verses reflect a common, and profound, conceptual link. But the only concept that fits both passages is the paradoxical engagement of human and divine activity in the total work of salvation—a concept that recurs elsewhere in Philippians (notably 3:7–14).

Any talk of coordinate human and divine work with reference to salvation, however, raises once again our initial difficulty: Is not such a concept subversive of Paul’s fundamental doctrine of grace? Part of the answer lies in the expression used above, “the total work of salvation.” It is conceded by all parties in the discussion that the term salvation (or its cognate verb) need not be restricted, as it normally is in contemporary evangelical language, to the initial act of conversion (“Have you been saved?”) or to the status of being in a right relationship with God (“Are you saved?”). It is of course true that, according to Paul, the initiative for salvation comes from God: our justification (the establishment of a right relationship) does not flow from our righteous conduct, for God “justifies the ungodly” (Rom. 4:5). Moreover, once a right relationship has been established, we can in no way “add” to that status by our conduct.

But the biblical concept of salvation is not thus restricted to justification; more commonly what is in view includes God’s redemptive work in its totality. Thus, while in a very important sense we have already been saved (Eph. 2:5, 8; Titus 3:5), in another sense we are yet to be saved (Rom. 5:9–10; 1 Cor. 3:15; 5:5; 2 Tim. 4:18). Calvin rightly claims “that salvation is taken to mean the entire course of our calling, and that this term includes all things by which God accomplishes that perfection, to which He has determined us by His free election.” Because salvation in its entire scope necessarily includes the manifestation of righteousness in our lives, it follows that our activity is integral to the process of salvation; we can never afford to forget the juxtaposition between verse 9 (“not of works”) and verse 10 (“for good works”) in Eph. 2. In the particular context of Phil. 2, the outworkings of the believer’s personal salvation take the form of corporate obligations within the Christian community: the duty of seeking the good of others.

It may still be objected, however, that to place such an emphasis on human work injects an element of “legalism” into Christian theology. The proper response to this concern is to appreciate in all its fullness the tension that obtains between verses 12 and 13.^[4] Our natural impulse is to deny or resolve the tension by highlighting some aspects at the expense of others. One way of doing it, as we have seen, is to focus on the sociological element of the passage (the community’s well-being) to the exclusion of the personal element.

For those who admit the soteriological thrust of the passage, the tendency is to define verse 12 by means of verse 13 (or verse 13 by means of verse 12), that is, to tone down human activity by appealing to divine grace (or vice versa). One may, for example, so emphasize the truth that God does not force us to act against our will, that as a result grace is restricted to little more than spiritual aid: “God will help us along, but it’s really up to us.” Conversely, fear of legalism may lead us to a more or less passive understanding of sanctification: “Our responsibility is simply to rest in God’s grace, to let him work in us.” The text itself, by its very juxtaposition of those two emphases, cries out loudly against any such attempts at resolution. And the point here is not merely that both the human and the divine are stressed, but that in one and the same passage we have what is perhaps the strongest biblical expression of each element.

Note first Paul’s concern with human activity. Although several NT verses place considerable emphasis on the role of human responsibility in salvation (cf. esp. 2 Pet. 1:10, “for as long as you practice these things, you will never stumble”), none puts it so bluntly as Phil. 2:12. The very choice of the verb katergazomai is notable. Chrysostom explained this compound form as indicating “with great effort, with great care”;^[5] though the evidence speaks against seeing such a nuance in the verb itself, we should not completely overlook the fact that this ancient Greek speaker perceived the term as emphatic. Bauer’s “achieve, accomplish” (BDAG 531, meaning 1) brings us closer to the distinctive nuance of the verb; he rightly places Phil. 2:12 under the second heading, “bring about, produce, create.” It is impossible to tone down the force with which Paul here points to our conscious activity in sanctification. The thought should give us pause: our salvation, which we confess to be God’s from beginning to end, is here described as something that we must bring about.

For all that, our dependence on divine activity for sanctification is nowhere made as explicit as here. To begin with, God's work is viewed as having a causal relation to our working (γάρ, gar, for); our activity is possible only because of divine grace. Second, the syntax is emphatic: Paul says not merely "God works" (ho theos energei) but "the one who works the working is God" (theos . . . estin ho energōn . . . to energein). Third, the divine influence is said to extend not only to our activity but to our very wills—a unique statement, though the idea is implied in other passages (e.g., John 1:13; Rom. 9:16). Calvin comments: "There are, in any action, two principal parts, the will, and the effective power. Both of these [Paul] ascribes to God; what more remains to us to glory in?" Fourth, the apostle reinforces our dependence on God's sovereignty with a concluding reference to "his good pleasure" (τῆς εὐδοκίας, tēs eudokias), a distinctly theological term used to describe divine grace (see the second additional note on 2:13).

The point is that, while sanctification requires conscious effort and concentration, our activity takes place not in a legalistic spirit, with a view to gaining God's favor, but rather in a spirit of humility and thanksgiving, recognizing that without Christ we can do nothing (cf. John 15:5) and so he alone deserves the glory. Perhaps the finest interpretive summary of Phil. 2:12–13 comes from John Murray (1961: 148–49):

God's working in us is not suspended because we work, nor our working suspended because God works. Neither is the relation strictly one of cooperation as if God did his part and we did ours so that the conjunction or coordination of both produced the required result. God works and we also work. But the relation is that because God works we work. All working out of salvation on our part is the effect of God's working in us. . . . We have here not only the explanation of all acceptable activity on our part but we also have the incentive to our willing and working. . . . The more persistently active we are in working, the more persuaded we may be that all the energizing grace and power is of God.^[6]

2. Blameless Children (2:14–16)

The coherence of the section 1:27–2:18 is confirmed when we note that the call to unity, which was first sounded in 1:27 and then expanded in 2:1–4, reappears here at the conclusion. But now the command is articulated in a quite different fashion. While the background of 1:27 is the conflict caused by opponents who bring suffering to the Christian community, here the setting is described in moral terms—a corrupt generation to which the Philippian Christian community provides a striking contrast. Moreover, whereas the instructions in 2:1–4 focus on the evil and danger of a selfish motivation, here Paul specifies the sin of γογγυσμῶν καὶ διαλογισμῶν (gongysmōn kai dialogismōn, lit., grumblings and disputes; see the additional note on 2:14).

Now the noun gongysmos (corresponding to Hebrew telûnāh) and the verb (dia)gongyzō (Hebrew lûn) immediately call to mind the murmuring of the Israelites in the wilderness (Exod. 15:24; 16:2, 7–9, 12, et al.; note also John 6:41, 43, which has Exod. 16 as its background, and cf. Paul’s explicit reference in 1 Cor. 10:10). Any doubts that this is the setting that Paul has in mind here are removed when we compare 2:15 with Deut. 32:5 LXX, where the Israelites are described as “spotted children, a crooked and perverse generation.”^[7] It is most interesting, and surely not a coincidence, that the other passage where Paul uses the experience of the Israelites in the wilderness as an example to motivate proper Christian behavior is 1 Cor. 10:1–13, that is, when writing to a church plagued by dissension.

It may be objected that the murmuring of the Israelites was directed at God, and that the problems in the wilderness are not described in the Bible as consisting of divisions among the people. Yet here precisely we may find an important clue to the nature of the Philippians’ weakness. The complaining of the Israelites was indeed directed at God, but in the person of his representative Moses. Is it not likely—or even inevitable—that the disputes within the Philippian community involved complaints against the appointed leaders? And would not Paul’s clear allusion to the wilderness experience alert the Philippians to the possibility that their behavior could be interpreted as quarreling with God (cf. Exod. 17:1–7)?^[8] These must remain intriguing questions, because the letter gives no clear answer. We may, however, point to 2:29 (see comments there) as a possible hint that the church leaders in Philippi were not being treated with full respect.

An additional problem is raised by an apparent lack of exact correspondence between the Deut. 32:5 passage and Paul’s application of that passage. In the former it is God’s people who seem to be described both as children—spotted children, to be sure—and as a perverse generation, whereas Paul splits the description by applying the term τέκνα (tekna, children) to God’s people in Philippi and γενεά (genea, generation), apparently, to the pagan environment. An answer to this problem must consider several factors:

1. The Greek of Deut. 32:5 is rather awkward,[9] but the most likely translation is, “They have sinned, they are not his children, they are blemished.” In other words, the Israelites’ status of sonship is here rejected; this is probably also the force of the Hebrew, which offers its own syntactical difficulties (see the critical commentaries). The idea then fits smoothly with the NT conception that God has shifted his redemptive work from Israel to Christian believers (Matt. 21:43; Rom. 2:28–29; 9:30–31).[10]
2. Paul certainly does not regard the Philippian believers as a rebellious group who can be described as “a crooked and perverse generation,” yet the use of that phrase could serve as a powerful reminder of the dangers created by a disobedient life.
3. The application of the second part of the phrase to the Gentile world generally (ἐν κόσμῳ, en kosmō) may somehow reflect the Pauline understanding of a great reversal in the affairs of Jews and Gentiles (notice, for example, Paul’s use of Hos. 2:23 in Rom. 9:25, though the point here is quite different).
4. In a singularly perceptive comment, Collange notes a possible irony in Paul’s application of the phrase: because the Jewish nation has been deprived of its status of sonship, “nothing remains for Israel but to melt away into the ‘perverse and straying’ mass of the world’s . . . humanity.”
5. But we may go a step further and see here an allusion to Paul’s Judaizing opponents. In chapter 3 Paul will describe Judaizers as “dogs,” a standard way of referring to Gentiles (see comments on 3:2–3); perhaps even here these opponents are not far from his mind. The Philippians’ stand against their Jewish opponents must not be threatened by a type of behavior that has been characteristic of the Jewish nation throughout its history (cf. Stephen’s speech in Acts 7). If this nuance is indeed present in Paul’s use of Deut. 32:5, one should nevertheless avoid pressing it, for the explicit reference to the world (en kosmō, presumably parallel to meson geneas) indicates that the Judaizers are not the primary object in view.

The specific character of Paul’s exhortation in verse 14 should not obscure the fact that the apostle couches his words in the context of a more general concern for the Philippians’ sanctification. Both the preceding and the following context present the broad panorama of salvation within which the pointed command of verse 14 serves as a hinge. We can best appreciate the conceptual relationship between verse 14 and what follows by noticing how these verses parallel the structure of 1:9–11:

exhortation intended to promote unity

the Philippians' love should abound (1:9; command implied)

the Philippians should not grumble (2:14) statement of goal (note hina): moral perfection sincerity, blamelessness, righteousness (1:10–11a) blamelessness, flawlessness, faultlessness (2:15; cf. Hawthorne's translation)

eschatological reference

at the day of Christ (1:10)

at the day of Christ (2:16) ultimate purpose (introduced with eis)

God's glory (1:11)

Paul's vindication (2:16)

Now as we saw in our discussion of 1:9–11, Paul's prayer focuses on the completion of the sanctifying process (though with the clear implication that the Philippians' spiritual progress must manifest itself in their present experience). In contrast, the exhortation of 2:14–16 takes on a certain forcefulness by focusing on the now of their Christian life (meson geneas . . . en kosmō). Yet even here Paul does not fail to set his sight, and that of his readers, on "the day of Christ."

In addition to his use of terms that indicate moral perfection (for which, see the second additional note on 2:15), Paul describes the proper conduct of the Philippians with two clauses: "among whom you appear as lights in the world, holding fast the word of life" (so NASB).^[11] Some ambiguities call for closer attention. For example, there has been some controversy whether the meaning of φαίνεσθε (phainesthe) is indeed "appear" (the common meaning of the middle voice) or "shine" (NIV; this meaning is normally represented by the active voice). That the middle can bear the sense "shine" seems confirmed by Isa. 60:2 (opp. skotos) and Matt. 24:27 (cf. BDAG 1046–47, meaning 1.b). In fact, H. Kennedy's (1897–1910: 442) comments should have put an end to the controversy: "Surely the appearing of a φωστήρ, a luminary, must be, at the same time, a shining. Both interpretations really converge in this context.”

If “shine” is then a proper translation, or at least a sure connotation, one can argue that ἐπέχοντες (epechontes) continues the metaphor, though with a new twist: the Philippians shine as they “hold out” (NIV) the brilliant word of life. One can just as easily argue that the rest of verse 16 suggests the idea of constancy, for which the translation “holding fast” is more suitable (so NASB; cf. NIV footnote: “hold on to”; and Poythress 2002, who prefers simply “having, holding”); we may further support this latter sense by noting that proper moral conduct, not primarily evangelism, is the real point of the passage. (For a completely different understanding of the participle, see the additional note on 2:16.)

One additional ambiguity is whether phainesthe should be taken as an indicative (so most versions) or as an imperative (“among whom you must shine”). The latter view was common among the early fathers and is preserved by Calvin, but it seems awkward to have an imperative within a relative clause, which in turn follows a purpose clause (cf. Hendriksen 1962: 124–25n106). Hawthorne argues for the imperative on the grounds that “there would be no purpose” in Paul’s “reminding the Philippians of what they are already doing.” We must remember, though, that the most basic NT incentive to holy living is an emphasis on what we already are. Paul’s marvelous description of believers in verse 15, even of Philippian believers who seem to be faltering, corresponds to the “you have always obeyed” of verse 12. Undoubtedly, the best commentary on Paul’s words is Matt. 5:14–16, where Jesus describes his disciples as ones who already are “the light of the world,” then proceeds with its implication for conduct: “let your light shine before men in such a way that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven.”

Jesus’s emphasis on God’s glory, interestingly, corresponds to the goal expressed in Phil. 1:11 but stands in sharp contrast—or so it appears—with Phil. 2:16b, “that I may have cause to glory because I did not run in vain nor toil in vain.” Particularly in view of the close structural and conceptual correspondence between 1:9–11 and 2:14–16, one must wonder how Paul can speak of his eschatological boasting as apparently on the same level with God’s glory. It may be helpful to note that verse 16b contains two ideas, both of which find parallels in Paul’s other letters: (1) the hope that his converts will be his grounds for glorying at the coming of Christ is found in 2 Cor. 1:14 and 1 Thess. 2:19; (2) the possibility that his work might come to naught (εἰς κενόν, eis kenon) occurred to him more than once, as we can see by such passages as Gal. 2:2 and 1 Thess. 3:5 (note also 1 Cor. 9:27 and 15:58). Quite likely, Paul's language reflects the promise of Isa. 65:17–25: when God creates the new heavens and the new earth, his people will rejoice (vv. 18–19) and will long enjoy the works of their toil (v. 22), for their labor will not be in vain (v. 23).^[12]

Especially important is the parallel in Phil. 1:20, where the note of glorying is expressed positively with a reference to Christ's exaltation (in Paul's body, to be sure), but negatively with a reference to Paul's avoidance of shame. As noted in the comments there, "shame" means the disgrace of God's judgment, and Paul acknowledges that for him to fail in his ministry would not bring honor to God. We do not have here an exaggerated conception of Paul's self-importance. Rather, we see a man for whom "to live is Christ." His life and work were so identified with Christ, and his ministry—particularly his distinctive Gentile ministry—was such a crucial factor in the work of Christ's kingdom, that he could speak of his own boasting and of God's glory in the same breath.^[13] Moreover, we should note once again in this regard the tension between God's work of grace and Paul's sense of his own responsibility. (The question whether Paul may have been uncertain of his ultimate future will receive attention in our discussion of 3:11 and 3:12.)

3. A Personal Appeal (2:17–18)

Paul's reference in verse 16 to the toil of his ministry was in effect an appeal to the Philippians to consider the spiritual condition of their church as having weighty implications for his apostolic work. Was the apostle thereby manipulating the emotions of his converts by evoking feelings of guilt? On the contrary, here in verse 17 he manages to increase the intensity of that appeal (εἰ καὶ σπένδομαι, ei kai spendomai, if my life should even be offered up in death; see additional notes on this verse) while at the same time encouraging his converts: happen what may, the Philippians' faith and ministry are already grounds for rejoicing.

For some commentators (esp. Lohmeyer), verse 17 indicates Paul's fear that his death was imminent. Other writers, however, have argued that the idea of death is not at all present in this verse. Following Denis (1958: 630–45), Hawthorne and Collange point out that the verb spendomai does not have to “denote a killing.” Of course not; it only denotes the pouring of a libation (normally wine, not blood) that accompanies a sacrifice. But this objection misses the point altogether, for the allusion to death is not based on the idea that the verb means a killing (or even necessarily a pouring of blood). Such uses as 2 Tim. 4:6 and Ign. Rom. 2.2 unquestionably show that the verb’s cultic associations made it suitable for use with reference to martyrdom.

It is also argued that a reference to martyrdom is not compatible with the note of joy in this passage. This is a startling objection. Is there anything more characteristic of Philippians than Paul’s juxtaposing of joy and adversity? Paul’s words in 1:18–20 are particularly relevant here, for that passage too contains a repetition of chairō (v. 18), and the joy in view is not affected by the possibility of death (eite dia zōēs eite dia thanatou, v. 20).

In short, Paul realistically acknowledges that his apostolic toils and suffering could lead to martyrdom, but he was more than willing to “spend and be expended” for the sake of his converts (2 Cor. 12:15). Nothing in this passage (certainly not the present tense of spendomai—see the second additional note on 2:17) indicates that Paul in fact expected to die soon. Much less can we allow the vividness of Paul’s metaphor to nullify the assurance reflected by the verb pepoitha in 1:25 and 2:24. Though he certainly seeks to avoid presumptuousness, Paul places his expectations in a positive light.

The details of the metaphor present some perplexing questions, such as whether it is Paul or the Philippians who are represented as priests,^[14] whether Jewish or pagan sacrifices are in view, and so forth. Given Paul’s stylistic traits, these are probably the wrong questions to ask (cf. H. Kennedy 1897–1910: 443); at any rate, the text gives no clear answer to them. They do have a bearing, however, on the substantive issue of whether τῇ θυσίᾳ καὶ λειτουργίᾳ τῆς πίστεως ὑμῶν (tē thysia kai leitourgia tēs pisteōs hymōn, lit., the sacrifice and service of your faith) refers to Paul’s apostolic ministry or to the Philippians’ good works.

The opinion that Paul has in mind his own sacrificial work can be defended by pointing to the emphasis on such a ministry in this context and to the fact that in Rom. 15:16 the apostle refers to himself as leitourgon . . . hierogounta (a minister . . . ministering as priest). In this view, pisteōs may be an objective genitive (“on behalf of your faith, resulting in your faith”; possibly faith viewed as the thing being sacrificed—see Alford 1871–75:

3.173; Meyer). Just a few verses later, however, Paul will use the term leitourgia in reference to the Philippians' gift (2:30; cf. also Rom. 15:27; 2 Cor. 9:12); and at the end of the epistle he will describe that gift as "an acceptable sacrifice" (thysian dektēn, 4:18). This evidence suggests strongly that the phrase in question refers to the participation of the Philippians in the gospel, the theme with which the epistle opened (1:5). If so, pisteōs is best understood as a subjective genitive, "ministry that springs from your faith" (so Lightfoot and Hawthorne, but see Vincent).

The point is very important, for it reveals the apostle's pastoral heart in affirming the genuineness of the Philippians' Christian commitment. Exhortation they need—even rebuke—but not discouragement. Without the benefit of twentieth-century counseling techniques, Paul recognizes his readers' needs and focuses on their worth in Christ; indeed, he interprets their gift in the best possible light as a source of great and mutual joy (cf. also the comments on 1:7).

But now, if the reason for Paul's joy was the Philippians' sacrificial service, the question arises whether the usual understanding of the syntax is accurate. Long ago Ewald argued that the prepositional phrase (beginning with epi) should be construed not with what precedes (spendomai) but with what follows (chairō). The resulting translation, taking epi in its common causal function, makes excellent sense: "If I should be poured out, I have reason to rejoice over your sacrificial service of faith."^[15] This construction, however, is a little unnatural, because Paul does not normally place a long prepositional phrase before the verb. A second and stronger argument against it is that Paul is surely alluding to the cultic terminology of the LXX, where the verb spendō or the noun spondē (or both!) may be construed with epi (e.g., Gen. 35:14; Exod. 30:9; on the force of this preposition, see O'Brien 1991: 307).

Additional Notes

2:12. μή ἐν τῇ παρουσίᾳ μου μόνον (not in my presence only): Most translations appear to construe this clause with the preceding verb (ὑπηκούσατε, "you have obeyed"), so that the word "presence" has reference to Paul's past relationship with the Philippians (cf. Schenk (1984: 214). This reading, reflecting an ad sensum construction, may be correct, but the μή (rather than οὐ) would seem to indicate a syntactical connection with the imperative κατεργάζεσθε.^[16] This factor leads Hawthorne (following Collange) to see a future reference, "not only in light of my anticipated coming," interpreted to mean that the Philippians were exhorted not to be motivated by fear of what Paul perhaps was going to do when he arrived (cf. 1 Cor. 4:21 and 2 Cor. 13:1–3). A future reference is indeed possible, but the text offers no shred of evidence for the idea that fear of the apostle may have been a factor in either his or the Philippians' minds (and can the nuance "in light of" for ὥς be supported with parallels?).

2:12. The syntax of this verse is indeed difficult: Vaticanus, followed by other witnesses, smooths things out a little by dropping the ὥς; and Lightfoot's attempt to explain the syntax (whether he is right or wrong) serves to confirm its difficult character. It seems preferable to refrain from specifying the temporal reference in view and to see the clause as a general statement; the ὥς is best explained by the use in Rom. 9:32; 2 Cor. 2:17; Philem. 4 (references given by Lightfoot and Vincent as pointing to motivation; cf. also Alford 1871–75: 3.170: "not as if [it were a matter to be done] in my presence only"). At any rate, it seems likely that Paul's absence had something to do with the Philippians' problems (see comments on 1:27 and 2:19–30).

2:12. Michael (1928: 99–100) puts forth the interesting thesis that Moses's anticipation of his own death (Deut. 31:27) may have influenced Paul's words. The fact that Paul alludes to Deut. 32:5 in 2:14–15 lends credence to this view, and one is surprised that it has not been picked up by other commentators. Michael presses the allusion when he argues that Paul views his death as imminent (see comments on 2:17).

2:12. μετὰ φόβου καὶ τρόμου (with fear and trembling): In support of the sociological understanding of this verse, some commentators argue for a greatly attenuated sense, such as "with respect and reverence for each other." Appeal is made to the fact that Paul's other uses of this word combination (1 Cor. 2:3; 2 Cor. 7:15; Eph. 6:5) deal with human relations. These three instances, however, hardly suggest that Paul could not use the phrase in a Godward sense. Moreover, Pedersen's insightful treatment of these passages (and 2 Cor. 10:5–6) persuasively shows that the phrase is equivalent to having a disposition of obedience to God in light of our weakness (ἐν ἁσθενείᾳ).^[17] When we note the LXX use of the phrase (esp. Exod. 15:16; Ps. 54:6 [55:6 MT; 55:5 Eng.]; Isa. 19:16), we can hardly fail to appreciate the tone of solemnity that it lends to Paul's command. The phrase in this context is probably intended to have the same force as 1 Cor. 10:12, "therefore let him who thinks he stands take heed lest he fall" (for other parallels with 1 Cor. 10:1–13, see comments on 2:14–16).

2:13. θεός: The Majority text, with little early support, includes the article ὁ (the passage is missing in P⁴⁶). The evidence for its omission is very impressive, while its inclusion can be readily understood as a scribal addition. On the other hand, the accidental omission of particles is common. In either case, no substantive difference results.

2:13. ὑπὲρ τῆς εὐδοκίας (for his good pleasure): The fact that the Greek does not have the pronoun αὐτοῦ (his) has led some to see here a reference to human goodwill in general (as in 1:15). This is out of the question, as Alford makes clear: "the insertion of the article where it is generally omitted from abstract nouns after a preposition, as here, necessarily brings in a reflexive sense,—to be referred to the subject of the sentence. . . ." (1871–75: 3.171).^[18] As for the use of ὑπέρ, Vincent appropriately refers to John 11:4 and Rom. 15:8. Conceptually, the phrase is roughly equivalent to εἰς δόξαν θεοῦ (to the glory of God), though its distinctive thrust is different. The predestinarian motif behind Paul's use of εὐδοκία is especially stressed by Pedersen (1978: 29– 30), who appeals to Eph. 1:5, 9, 11 and to the focus on divine sovereignty in the parallel reference, 1 Cor. 12:11 (καθὼς βούλεται, as he wills; cf. Vogt 1957).

2:14. γογγυσμῶν καὶ διαλογισμῶν: We could attempt to represent the plural with such a rendering as “outbursts of complaints and arguments” (cf. Lightfoot 1890: 211 on θυμοί in Gal. 5:20), but the Greek is not that emphatic. Though BDAG (232–33 [meaning 3]), no doubt correctly, supports the translation “disputing” for διαλογισμῶν (so NASB; similarly NIV, “arguing”), it must be noted that this meaning is rare. Older commentators suggested such renderings as “speculations,” “doubtings,” “hesitation”; Huther (1890: 102), commenting on 1 Tim. 2:8, argued plausibly for the sense of evil “deliberations toward one’s neighbors.” The word is found among the papyri in the setting of judicial proceedings (see MM), but this evidence is hardly sufficient to see in the present verse, as Martin (1976: 104) argues, a reference to litigations among Christians in pagan courts. Is it possible that Paul’s use of the term reflects once more the Israelites’ conduct in the wilderness? Note particularly the judicial flavor of Hebrew רִיב (rib, quarrel) in Exod. 17:2, 7.

2:15. ἵνα γένησθε: The reading ἦτε (be) instead of γένησθε (become) has both (proto-) Alexandrian and “Western” support.^[19] This variant may be the result of assimilation to comparable passages (e.g., 1 Cor. 5:7; 2 Cor. 9:3; Eph. 5:27; 2 Tim. 3:17; and esp. Phil. 1:10), but we could list even more passages in Paul that construe ἵνα with a subjunctive form of γίνομαι. Conceivably, some scribes may have thought that γίνομαι would imply that the Philippians were not yet children of God, but it would be misleading to press the force of “become” in this verb. So even though the textual decision is difficult, the difference between the two variants is not substantive. The verbs in question are certainly interchangeable in some contexts, and the parallel with 1:10 suggests that this is one such place.

2:15. ἄμεμπτοι . . . ἀκέραιοι . . . ἄμωμα: Here again a sharp distinction among these words should probably be avoided. The first and last terms are particularly close. The second term, ἀκέραιοι, has a close semantic connection with εἰλικρινεῖς (used in the Phil. 1:10 parallel). One should hesitate to appeal to the etymology of ἀκέραιοι (ἀ + κεράννυμι = unmixed) and to conclude that, while ἄμεμπτοι “relates to the judgment of others,” ἀκέραιοι “describes the intrinsic character” of a person.^[20] Rather, we should here invoke the notion of stylistic reinforcement (see introduction, “Language and Style”). The Majority text, supported by “Western” manuscripts, reads ἀμώμητα for ἄμωμα, possibly by assimilation to the LXX of Deut. 32:5; these terms appear to be virtually complete synonyms.^[21]

2:16. λόγον ζωῆς ἐπέχοντες: In addition to the interpretations discussed above, one should note the rendering of the Syriac version, ditaykûn lehûn bdûkat hayyê, “because you are to them in place of life.” Field (1899: 194) argued that this translation is accurate, for it reflects an idiomatic use of ἐπέχω λόγον (correspond) attested in late Greek authors.^[22] In support of this view one could note that the combination λόγον ζωῆς does not occur elsewhere in Paul; further, out of the three other occurrences of λόγον in Philippians (1:14; 4:15, 17), only the first one means “word.” These are not strong arguments and so Field’s suggestion has been largely ignored; a careful refutation, however, would be helpful before the interpretation is completely forgotten.

2:17. ἀλλὰ εἰ καί: Strictly speaking, “if even” (though unacceptably awkward) is a more accurate rendering than “even if.” The intensive καί affects what immediately follows, and so its position makes a clear difference on how one reads the conditional clause. We may say that εἰ καὶ focuses on the extremity of the condition, whereas καὶ εἰ stresses the unlikelihood of the condition (in the latter case, it becomes more natural to use ἔάν, as in Gal. 1:8; contrast 6:1); in English, “even if” serves both purposes. In the present case, εἰ καὶ serves to contrast Paul’s hard labors (v. 16) with the extremity of death (it does not necessarily suggest that Paul viewed his death as probable, as suggested by Alford 1871–75: 3.173). This observation in turn accounts for the contrastive ἀλλά: “Yes, I have labored hard, but even death cannot take away my joy.”

2:17. σπένδομαι (I am being poured out): Hawthorne argues that the present tense must describe “what is currently happening,” for “there is no clue that points to future time.” But there is indeed a clue, which lies in the extremity of the condition (see previous note). Ἐάν + subjunctive (indicating a future condition, BDF §373.1) in Mark 9:43 corresponds to εἰ + indicative in the parallel, Matt. 5:29, suggesting that the latter too can be used of a future condition (cf. BDF §372.3). Fee (1995: 252–53) seems to say that a first-class condition, often mislabeled a “real” condition, indicates “actuality.” Nothing of the sort. The syntax of εἰ + present indicative simply indicates that if the condition is true (whether or not the speaker believes it to be true), it is true in the present. But Matt. 5:29 is evidence for the possibility of a future reference.

2:17. συγχαίρω: The rendering “congratulate” (as in Luke 1:58) was preferred by Lightfoot but has not received much acceptance; it seems inappropriate in this context. H. Kennedy (1897–1910: 443) helpfully points to 1 Cor. 12:26. The expression “share my joy” may be imprecise, since the verb (to join in someone else’s joy) seems to assume that the other party is already rejoicing. If we press this point, however, the imperative of verse 18 appears superfluous.

- III. A Call to Sanctification (1:27–2:30)
 - A. Christian Citizenship (1:27–2:4)
 - B. Christian Humility (2:5–11)
 - C. Christian Obedience (2:12–18)
 - D. Resumption of Paul’s Missionary Report (2:19–30)

D. Resumption of Paul’s Missionary Report (2:19–30)

It is not immediately apparent how verses 19–30 fit into the literary structure of Philippians as a whole. One approach to the problem is to stress the character of this passage as a typical Pauline “travelogue.”^[1] Among relevant features we may note, for example, Paul’s desire to see the Philippians (v. 26; cf. Rom. 15:23; 1 Thess. 2:17; etc.), his intention to visit the Philippians soon (v. 24; cf. Rom. 15:28; Philem. 22; etc.), and his dispatching of an emissary in the meantime (vv. 19, 23, 25, 28; cf. Col. 4:8; 1 Thess. 3:2; etc.). Since the travelogues often come at the end of Paul’s epistles, and since 3:1 is introduced with τὸ λοιπόν (to loipon, finally), some scholars identify verses 19–30 as the closing of the body segment. If this approach should be accepted, one would not feel pressed to find a close connection between these verses and the preceding context.

Quite a different approach, however, is that which reminds us that the travelogue may come earlier in the body of the epistle (see esp. 1 Cor. 4:17–19), and this factor suggests a particular function for the passage within the body. Hawthorne, for example, stresses the way that Paul describes Timothy as one not motivated by selfish interests (vv. 20–22), that is, as someone who models the qualities commended in 1:27–2:18. Swift (1984: 245) goes so far as to deny that 2:19 is “a break in the argument of the chapter: it is simply a transition to another link in the chain of reasoning that supports that argument.”^[2]

Still a third approach is indicated by the title I have given to this section. If we view 2:19–30 as resuming the missionary report of 1:12–26, we may be in a better position to recognize what is most distinctive in the literary structure of Philippians, namely, the prominence that Paul gives to informing the church in Philippi concerning his affairs and plans. Funk (1967: 261–62) has noted that, as a travelogue, verses 19–30 appear to be incomplete; his persuasive explanation is that the matter of Paul’s presence is integral to the theme of the body and woven into it: “In this case, therefore, it seems legitimate to fill out the apostolic parousia from elsewhere in the letter” (e.g., 1:8, 19, 25–27; 2:12). These factors suggest that we need neither exaggerate nor minimize the break at 2:19. This verse does begin a new thought (contra Swift 1984); the segment 1:27–2:18, what we have called the central section of the letter, has its own coherence. We may readily admit that verses 19–30 support the thrust of that central section while insisting that the primary purpose of these verses is to give information regarding Paul’s plans. To put it differently, the apostle’s report (1:12–26; 2:19–30), which brackets the central section, serves as the specific point of reference for both his exhortations and his commendations.

If we now shift our focus to the inner structure of verses 19–30 themselves, we note two parallel sections, the first one dealing with Timothy (vv. 19–24), the second with Epaphroditus (vv. 25–30). Both sections are commendatory and both appear to discuss the same topic, namely, the sending of Timothy/Epaphroditus to Philippi for the mutual benefit of the Philippians and Paul. For all the similarities, however, more suggestive and exegetically significant is the contrast between the two paragraphs.

With regard to Timothy, Paul says (twice, vv. 19, 23) that he wishes to send him soon; and the commendation focuses on Timothy’s devotion to, and likemindedness with, the apostle. The sending of Epaphroditus, on the other hand, is described as something “necessary” (ἀναγκαῖον, anankaion, v. 25); moreover, Paul emphasizes Epaphroditus’s relationship to the Philippians and evidently thinks it is important to request that this servant be given a warm and respectful welcome. Indeed, Paul ends by raising the Philippians’ consciousness of their obligation to Epaphroditus (vv. 29–30).

It is almost impossible to avoid noting a certain apologetic tone in verses 25–30, but we are left to reading between the lines. Although several reconstructions are possible, I shall argue that the Philippians, supposing that Epaphroditus could stay with Paul, had counted on a visit from Timothy. Paul’s decision to send Epaphroditus in Timothy’s stead requires explanation: the apostle first assures them that he does intend to fulfill their wish of seeing Timothy, then he makes a special effort to ensure that, in such an awkward situation, Epaphroditus will be treated with the appreciation he deserves. This analysis leads to a simple outline:

1. Timothy (2:19–24)
2. Epaphroditus (2:25–30)

Exegesis and Exposition

¹⁹I fully expect through the “Lord” Jesus to send Timothy to you soon, so that I too may find comfort once I learn how you are doing. ²⁰[Do not misunderstand my decision not to send him just now:] he is genuinely concerned about your problems. I have made this decision because I have no one so close to me as he is—²¹all others seek their own interests, not those of Jesus Christ. ²²But “you know” well his mettle: as a child would relate to his father, so he has served by my side for the furtherance of the gospel. ²³So [you need not worry]: I expect to send him as soon as I have a clearer view of my affairs. ²⁴And [besides] I am confident in the Lord that soon I myself will come “” as well.

²⁵So I have found it necessary [not to grant your request but] to send to you Epaphroditus, my brother and coworker and fellow soldier, who is also your emissary [sent as] a minister for my need. ²⁶[I have made this decision] because he has been longing “for all of you”. He was also in distress, since you heard that he was ill. ²⁷[The report was true;] indeed, he was so ill that he came close to death. But God had mercy on him—and not on him only but also on me, lest I should have grief added upon grief. ²⁸I have therefore sent him with all the greater dispatch, so that you may see him again and rejoice, and I for my part may be relieved of my anxiety. ²⁹So welcome him in the Lord with all joy and hold men such as are like him in esteem, ³⁰because it was for the work “of Christ” that he came near death, “having risked” his life so that he might do what you could not have done without him: bringing to completion your ministry to me.

1. Timothy (2:19–24)

The conjunction δέ (de, v. 19, translated “but” in NASB) may be viewed as merely resumptive/transitional; if so, we may render it “now” or leave it untranslated (cf. NIV). If the adversative notion is insisted upon, the contrast may be with verse 17 (“although I face some dangers, I still hope . . .”; cf. Meyer; Vincent) or, better, with the more general matter of Paul’s absence, which is such a dominant theme in the epistle (cf. Lightfoot and Hawthorne, though they see here a specific contrast with 2:12).

This passage, at any rate, raises the question whether the Philippians themselves had certain expectations with regard to an apostolic visit.

Certainly they hoped to see Paul personally, but we may safely assume that they were not counting on it for the immediate future. Short of that, they may well have expected a visit from Timothy, whose ministry to the Philippians was so closely linked with Paul's (see introduction, "Historical Context"). It seems reasonable—though admittedly speculative—to suppose that their voluntary decision to part with Epaphroditus, who could now stay with the apostle and minister to his needs, was intended to free Timothy for such a visit.

Perhaps we find in the word καὶ γὰρ (kagō, I also) a subtle indication of this background. When Paul sent an emissary, the purpose normally was that the church in question may be informed with regard to Paul's affairs and thus receive encouragement.^[3] Here in Philippians Paul expresses the purpose conversely: "so that I too [or even I] may be comforted when I learn of your condition" (ἵνα καὶ γὰρ εὐψυχῶ γνούς τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν, hina kagō eupsychō gnous ta peri hymōn). The statement takes for granted that the Philippians' benefit was the main motive for the proposed visit by Timothy. It may well be that the reason this point is not explicitly stated is that the Philippians themselves had made the request. Indeed, here we may have one important reason Philippians was written at all: Paul must respond to their request.^[4]

If this reconstruction has any merit at all, Paul's commendation of Timothy takes on a new significance. Did the apostle need to prevent a misunderstanding? Might some think that he was hesitant to send Timothy because he no longer trusted him? Then again, perhaps he feared that the Philippians would wonder if Timothy had lost interest in them—notice the emphasis on the fact that Timothy γνησίως . . . μεριμνήσει (gnēsiōs . . . merimnēsei, will be genuinely concerned, v. 20). A third factor is Paul's need of Timothy: formally, the commendation in verse 20 appears to explain why Paul wanted to send him (rather than someone else, note the gar), but in effect Timothy's fine qualities demonstrate why it was necessary (ἀναγκαῖον, anankaion, v. 25) for him to stay with the apostle. (My translation above attempts to bring out this point by inverting the order of the clauses.) Finally, as recent commentators emphasize, Paul needed to send someone who could help resolve the tensions in the Philippian community.

Our very fragmentary knowledge of the circumstances prevents us from reaching clear-cut answers; indeed, it is quite possible that all these factors may have been at work. In any case, Paul took this opportunity to make some remarkable comments about Timothy. That the emphasis lies on Timothy's great value for Paul is clear from the way the commendation ends in verse 22: the Philippians themselves were witnesses that Timothy "has proved himself" (NIV), particularly by serving alongside the apostle with the faithfulness and affection that one might expect from a son (on the theme of spiritual parenthood, see O'Brien 1991: 324). This unique relationship made Timothy's presence indispensable to Paul, a thought clearly implied by the comment that Timothy would leave him as soon as the apostle's own situation became clearer (v. 23).

But what was it about Paul's circumstances that made Timothy's presence so important? A common answer among commentators is that the apostle was uncertain about his judicial fate and wanted to wait until that matter was decided. Hawthorne properly argues against this interpretation on the basis of verse 24. A better approach is to focus on the first part of the commendation (vv. 20–21) and to note that Timothy's worth is highlighted by contrasting him with others who were not "of like spirit" (ἰσόψυχον, isopsychon; see the first additional note on 2:20) and who "seek after their own interests."

Those words may have a double reference. Indirectly, they serve as an additional rebuke to selfish members of the Philippian community. More directly, they remind us of Paul's difficult circumstances, described in 1:12–17. In that passage, Paul's emphasis on the positive effects of his imprisonment should not keep us from recognizing the serious conflict and grievous adversity that he was experiencing (cf. 1:29–30). Although we are ignorant of the details, we may safely surmise that Paul's situation called for the support that only a confidant such as Timothy could provide. (In a later and even more serious predicament, at a time when Paul felt deserted and his death seemed imminent, he would write to Timothy: "Make an effort to come to me quickly" [2 Tim. 4:9].)

Paul's promise to the Philippians, then, was that Timothy would come to them as soon as possible, that is, when the apostle's circumstances became more stable (v. 23). However, lest the Philippians interpret his words in a purely negative way, as though he were in imminent danger, he reassures them, much as he had done earlier (1:23–26), by expressing forcefully (πέποιθα ἐν κυρίῳ, pepoitha en kyriō, I am persuaded in the Lord, v. 24) his expectation to visit Philippi in the near future.

2. Epaphroditus (2:25–30)

It has already been noted above that Paul’s commendation of Epaphroditus seems to carry an apologetic overtone and that, possibly, the passage reflects a certain awkwardness: Was Epaphroditus a consolation prize, sent simply because Timothy, whom the Philippians expected, had to stay with Paul? Against this reconstruction, one could argue that Paul gives quite a different reason for having “thought it necessary” to make this decision: Epaphroditus was greatly distressed about his separation from the Philippians (v. 26). But the two reasons were not mutually exclusive; rather, they coincided in demonstrating the reasonableness of Paul’s decision. In any case, verse 26 focuses on the deep emotional attachment between Epaphroditus and the Philippian church, a point further stressed in verse 28—the Philippians will have cause for joy when they see him again.

Paul uses two forceful expressions in describing Epaphroditus’s emotions. The linking of the verb ἐπιποθέω (epipotheō, to long for) directly with the personal pronoun (contrast Rom. 1:11; 1 Thess. 3:6; 2 Tim. 1:4) is worthy of note, since Paul uses the same construction in 1:8 to describe his own feelings toward the Philippians (cf. also 2 Cor. 5:2; 9:14). Moreover, Epaphroditus’s longings were accompanied by mental distress, a condition that Paul describes with an infrequent and vivid term, ἀδημονέω (adēmoneō; the only other NT occurrences of this verb are found in the Gethsemane pericope, Matt. 26:37; Mark 14:33).

Somewhat surprisingly, this distress is attributed to Epaphroditus’s knowledge that the Philippians had heard about his illness. Once again, our ignorance of the circumstances prevents us from appreciating fully the nature of his concern. Barth (1962: 88) suggests that Paul was seeking to interpret Epaphroditus’s immature homesickness in the best possible light. Buchanan (1964: 160) supposes that Epaphroditus was grieving because he had sent a false alarm to the Philippians and feared that they would try to send him relief.^[5] Other interpretations are possible, but none certain. What seems clear is that Epaphroditus’s personal need—or sense of responsibility—to return was serious. Providentially, this set of circumstances dovetailed with Paul’s own need to keep Timothy at his side.

In his commendation, Paul confirms that the reports about Epaphroditus’s illness were correct. Indeed (καὶ γάρ, kai gar, v. 27), his condition was more dangerous than the Philippians probably realized, for he nearly died. It is noteworthy that Paul makes this point thrice in verses 27, 30: he was close (παραπλήσιον, paraplēsion) to death; he came near (ἤγγισεν, ēngisen) death; he risked his life. One can hardly avoid the impression that Paul needed to prevent a possible misunderstanding when the Philippians saw, not Timothy (whom they had expected?), but Epaphroditus, safe and sound. Had they grieved in vain over his health? Had he been unable to fulfill his mission? Had the whole project been a fiasco?

Absolutely not.^[6] In fact, his illness was directly tied to fulfilling the Philippians' mission (v. 30). The implication seems to be that, in spite of the illness, which must have struck him during his journey, Epaphroditus pressed on at the risk of his life (cf. introduction, "Historical Context"). Perhaps his condition had greatly deteriorated by the time he reached Rome, and his life hung in the balance for a while. Paul, who was already bearing some heavy burdens, must have anguished over the possibility that Epaphroditus's work of mercy might turn into a new source of grief (v. 27).

But God showed himself merciful, and now the apostle, with joy, exalts Epaphroditus: he did what he did "for the work of Christ" (v. 30); he was not only a brother but also Paul's "coworker and fellow soldier" (v. 25), a description that does not necessarily refer to any previous association but may indicate just how highly Paul regarded Epaphroditus's faithfulness in fulfilling the Philippian mission. This mission he gratefully acknowledges as a priestly service (λειτουργία, leitourgia, v. 30; note leitourgos in v. 25; see comments on 2:17; 4:18), and Paul wanted to make sure that Epaphroditus was received with the honor he deserved (v. 29).

Additional Notes

2:19. ἐλπίζω δὲ ἐν κυρίῳ Ἰησοῦ: The verb is repeated in verse 23, while the phrase ἐν κυρίῳ is used in connection with πέποιθα in verse 24. In normal English usage, the verb hope implies a measure of doubt, but this is not necessarily the case with ἐλπίζω, particularly since the noun ἐλπίς takes on a charged theological nuance in the NT. Schenk (1984: 228), by pointing out the various linguistic parallels between verse 19 and verses 23–24, argues for the contextual synonymy of ἐλπίζω and πέποιθα here. If there is any semantic distinction, perhaps one could argue that the former verb, in this context, indicates intention (could we translate, "I expect"?). The reference to the Lord at the beginning and end of this paragraph adds solemnity to Paul's words and may be a further indication of the delicacy of the subject. (Instead of κυρίῳ, the "Western" manuscripts D* F G, with scattered support, read Χριστῷ, perhaps because Paul does not use the title "the Lord Jesus" as frequently as he uses other combinations.)

2:20. ἰσόψυχον: The NASB rendering, “of kindred spirit,” is very appropriate in that it preserves something of the vagueness of the Greek while favoring the most reasonable interpretation, namely, likemindedness with Paul (with probable reference to his love for the Philippians; cf. Chrysostom). Others prefer the idea “I have no one else like him” (so NIV), which is possible but hardly necessary (Lightfoot’s argument that otherwise ἄλλον or πλὴν τούτου would be required has little substance). Nothing in the text argues against seeing a reference to Paul, while the emphasis on the father-son relationship (v. 22) strongly supports such a reference.

2:20. ὅστις γνησίως τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν μεριμνήσει: A number of commentators, appealing to the father-son relationship mentioned in verse 22, interpret the adverb γνησίως according to its etymology, that is, with the nuance of “legitimacy,” but this seems rather doubtful; the rendering “genuinely” or “sincerely” is unexceptionable. The literal translation of the future verb μεριμνήσει (as in NASB, “will genuinely be concerned”) could mislead the modern reader; however we choose to explain the tense, a present rendering is justified (cf. NIV, “who takes a genuine interest”).

2:21. οἱ πάντες γὰρ τὰ ἑαυτῶν ζητοῦσιν: The phrase is equivalent to τὰ ἑαυτῶν σκοποῦντες in 2:4 (see comments there). Quite remarkable is Paul’s accusation that “all” (οἱ πάντες) were motivated by selfishness. Clearly he cannot mean this in an absolute sense. At the very least, Epaphroditus must be excluded from such a group; it is also very unlikely that the brethren described in 1:14 belong in this category. A common way of restricting the statement is to say that it refers only to those who were available as possible emissaries (see esp. Hendriksen 1962: 135–36). There is probably some truth in that, but it is not completely satisfactory, since Epaphroditus too served as an emissary. We need to admit that Paul uses a measure of hyperbole here (cf. Collange). Moreover, we should recall that Paul’s primary concern in commending Timothy was not (as it may formally appear) to show his qualifications for such a trip but to persuade the Philippians that he was needed at the apostle’s side. Epaphroditus, who did not share the intimacy of one who had labored with Paul for an extended period of time, stood in a different category altogether.

2:22. γινώσκετε: Ψ⁴⁶ reads οἶδατε, a variant that conforms with the Pauline pattern of using the verb οἶδα with ὅτι. In this verse, however, the verb also rules a direct object (τὴν δοκιμὴν), and in such cases Paul seems to prefer γινώσκω (cf. Silva 1980: 201).

2:23. ἔξαυτῆς: The translation “immediately” (cf. NASB) is quite misleading, because the point is precisely that Timothy cannot be sent right away; the words “as soon as” sufficiently reproduce the idea conveyed by the whole clause.

2:24. ἐλεύσομαι: The addition of the words πρὸς ὑμᾶς has respectable textual support but looks suspicious (it smooths out the sense by completing the thought of the verb).

2:25. ἀναγκάϊον δὲ ἡγησάμην (but I considered it necessary): The verb here, as well as ἔπεμψα in verse 28 (but certainly not πέμψαι in verse 25, as Martin 1976: 119 would have it—the infinitive does not indicate past tense at all), is correctly understood by most commentators as an epistolary aorist: the action is viewed as past, according to the perspective of the recipients when they read the letter (cf. Col. 4:8; Philem. 12; BDF §334 has some inaccuracies; cf. the fuller discussion in Robertson 1934: 845). If so, Epaphroditus should be viewed as the bearer of the letter. NASB and NIV attempt to convey the force of δέ with the phrase “who is also.”

2:25. ὑμῶν . . . ἀπόστολον: Hawthorne’s suggestion that Paul uses this word to stress Epaphroditus’s equality with him seems fanciful. The very fact that Epaphroditus is described as the Philippians’ (not Jesus Christ’s) apostle makes all the difference; the nontheological sense of “envoy” (as in 2 Cor. 8:23) is surely intended. And yet, the combination of this term with λειτουργός, “[priestly] minister,” is probably designed as the highest of commendations.

2:26. ἐπιποθῶν ἦν πάντας ὑμᾶς: Both the Alexandrian and the “Western” traditions are divided in their support of this reading over against the insertion of ἰδεῖν (“he was longing to see you all”). The weight of the Majority text (which is normally characterized by additions) tips the scales in favor of taking the omission as original. The verb ἰδεῖν must have been added very early on the analogy of Rom. 1:11, etc.

2:28. σπουδαιοτέρως: Hawthorne makes the provocative suggestion that this comparative adverb should be taken with the sense “sooner than expected” (see his translation, 1983: 114). Because the text does not specify the point of reference for the comparison (cf. comments on ἀναγκαιότερον in 1:24 and ὑπερύψωσεν in 2:9), Vincent’s rendering commends itself: “with the greater dispatch.” Vincent’s understanding corresponds closely with Hawthorne’s, which we may use to support the reconstruction suggested above: the Philippians did not expect to see Epaphroditus so soon—they wanted Timothy.

2:28. πάλιν: We should probably construe this adverb with ἰδόντες (against Lightfoot and others). There is no contextual reason to do otherwise.

2:28. καὶ γὰρ ἀλυπότερος ὦ: The NASB translation “less concerned” is much too weak, particularly because the allusion is to λύπην ἐπὶ λύπην in the previous verse (moreover, the addition of “about you” is gratuitous). Hawthorne properly translates, “and I may be relieved of anxiety” (cf. NIV). Several ideas have been suggested as to why the sending of Epaphroditus would have had this effect on Paul. The only indication in the text itself, however, is the emotional duress that Epaphroditus was experiencing as long as he did not return to Philippi (v. 26).

2:29. ἐν κυρίῳ: According to Chrysostom, the force of these words is either “with much zeal” or “God willing.”

2:30. τὸ ἔργον Χριστοῦ: It was a valid insight that led Lightfoot and Lohmeyer to follow the lone authority of C in reading τὸ ἔργον by itself without a modifying genitive. The discovery of Ψ⁴⁶, however, makes this position no longer tenable, for the three-pronged support of (τοῦ) Χριστοῦ by (proto-)Alexandrian (Ψ⁴⁶ B 1739), “Western” (D F G Old Latin Vulg), and Byzantine witnesses is overwhelming.

2:30. παραβολευσάμενος τῇ ψυχῇ: The KJV reads “not regarding his life,” reflecting the Majority text variant παραβουλεσάμενος, but ancient testimony is decisively against it. Lees (1925–26) claimed to find further support for the verb παραβολεύομαι, which appears to have had gambling connotations, in the “striking” correspondence it provides with the meaning of the name Epaphroditus: “charming,” because blessed by the goddess of fortune, Aphrodite, therefore “fortunate, lucky.” That Paul intended such a pun is possible but very unlikely. The only support Lees gives for his understanding of this name is that Sulla, in celebration of his political triumphs, adopted it as a translation of Felix, “fortunate,” but even this incident had nothing to do with gambling.^[7] Moreover, the verb παραβολεύομαι and the more common adjective παράβολος and verb παραβάλλομαι seldom if ever are used with explicit reference to gambling; the metaphorical senses of “risk, peril, venture,” etc., are dominant.

2:30. ἵνα ἀναπληρώσῃ τὸ ὑμῶν ὑστέρημα τῆς πρὸς με λειτουργίας: The NASB renders “to complete what was deficient in your service to me,” but this translation suggests, quite misleadingly, that Paul is being critical of the Philippians. (That the word ὑστέρημα need not imply a negative judgment is clear from Col. 1:24, “I complete what is lacking in Christ’s afflictions.”) Possibly we have here an allusion to the fact that, previously, they had lacked opportunity to minister to the apostle (see comments on 4:10). Peterlin (1995: 199–205) argues, unpersuasively, that some of the Philippians had withdrawn their support of Paul, that the gift turned out to be inadequate, and that therefore Epaphroditus had to make up for it.

An interesting parallel is 1 Cor. 16:17–18, where Paul exhorts the Corinthians to “acknowledge” (that is, show appreciation for) three representatives from the church at Corinth who, in coming to visit him, had made possible what the church set out to do (τὸ ὑμέτερον ὑστέρημα οὗτοι ἀνεπλήρωσαν). Whatever the precise import of this reference, Paul’s use of the word ὑστέρημα was intended to remind the Corinthians of their dependence on, and debt owed to, these emissaries. We find a similar concern here in Phil. 2:30, except that the “lack” is specifically identified with reference to the Philippians’ contribution; they could not have fulfilled their good work without Epaphroditus’s devotion to it.

Interestingly, 1 Clem. 38.2 uses the same expression in a different sense: the poor man should thank God that he has provided a rich man “through whom his lack might be supplied” (δι’ οὗ ἀναπληρωθῇ αὐτοῦ τὸ ὑστέρημα). This reference suggests that it might have seemed natural for Paul to speak about his own lack being supplied by Epaphroditus and the Philippians (as in 2 Cor. 11:9, τὸ ὑστέρημά μου προσανεπλήρωσαν), but he prefers to focus on the advantage that accrues to the giver (see further comments on 4:17).

- I. Opening (1:1–11)
- II. Paul’s Missionary Report (1:12–26)
- III. A Call to Sanctification (1:27–2:30)
- IV. Doctrinal Polemics (3:1–4:1)
- V. Final Concerns (4:2–23)

IV. Doctrinal Polemics (3:1–4:1)

Chapter 3 of Philippians is without dispute a singularly powerful passage—a foundational building block for theology and a true classic of Christian spirituality. But what is its place in the structure of the letter as a whole? This question, rather basic for the proper interpretation of the passage, admits of no easy answers. In the view of many scholars, the shift in tone and content is inexplicably abrupt, suggesting that 3:2–4:1 constitutes a separate document that has been interpolated by a later redactor.^[1] This position finds literary support in the τὸ λοιπόν (to loipon, finally) of 3:1, which appears to introduce the concluding section of the letter; indeed, skipping from 3:1 to 4:4 (or even to 4:2) results in a rather smooth reading. As Schmithals (1972: 72) puts it: “Verses 3:1 and 4:4 fit together so exactly that upon sober reflection one must come to the conclusion that a later hand has pulled the two verses apart.”

The main difficulty with this analysis is that the very arguments used to support it speak against the probability that a redactor is responsible for the text as it stands. If it is difficult to believe that Paul would have written in such an abrupt manner, it is even more difficult to accept that a later editor would have been so inept as to disturb a supposed original passage that fitted together “exactly.” Why should an editor have created the abruptness when it was completely unnecessary for him to do so? Why not introduce the extraneous material at a less awkward point (e.g., after 1:30 or 2:18)?

The question of the epistle’s integrity lies on the boundary between textual and literary criticism (cf. Gamble 1977: 143–44). From a text-critical perspective we should note, first, that there is no manuscript evidence supporting the view that chapter 3 is an interpolation. In other words, this view must be regarded as a conjectural emendation. Second, the principle of transcriptional probability speaks against such an emendation, for the “harder” (but not impossible) reading is the text as we have it. In other words, we cannot find a persuasive motive that would induce some later editor or copyist to create this stylistic difficulty.

But the theory also fails from the perspective of literary criticism. It has often been noted that chapter 3 contains some significant parallels with the rest of the epistle, such as the structural similarities between 2:6–11 and 3:7–10 (see below), the pointed references to the cross in 2:8 and 3:18, and the concept of citizenship in 1:27 and 3:20. This last example is strengthened when we note the likelihood that the two verses bracket a major section by means of a literary inclusio (politeuesthe . . . stēkete in 1:27 and politeuma . . . stēkete in 3:20; 4:1).[2]

The case against the integrity of Philippians, therefore, is not nearly as strong as is often suggested. And yet, we must not minimize the abruptness at the beginning of chapter 3. To say, for example, that (to) loipon does not necessarily introduce the concluding section of an epistle is technically correct (cf. 1 Cor. 7:29; 1 Thess. 4:1). But in this passage we have a combination of features that requires explanation. To begin with, the phrase is followed by ἀδελφοί μου, χαίρετε ἐν κυρίῳ (adelphoi mou, chairete en kyriō, my brothers, rejoice in the Lord), which closely parallels 2 Cor. 13:11 (loipon, adelphoi, chairete).[3] Moreover, this phrase occurs right after the travelogue, which normally comes toward the end of the letter (but see above, introduction to 2:19–30). We should admit, at the very least, that there is a slight anomaly here—this feature may be one more evidence of the ease with which Paul adapts literary conventions.

On the other hand, we may leave open the possibility that Paul had indeed intended to bring the letter to an end at this point and that for some reason decided against it. Does not the second part of 3:1 suggest that the apostle had been weighing in his mind the advantages and disadvantages of repeating material (τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν, ta auta graphein, to write the same things) that he had previously communicated to the Philippians?[4] It is perhaps not too far-fetched to speculate that Paul stopped writing or dictating after the words chairete en kyriō; by the time he returned to the document he had decided he must include a doctrinal discussion, just to be safe (ἀσφαλές, asphales). We may be grateful he did.

This doctrinal section admits of a threefold division. Verses 1–6 set the context for the polemics by pointing out the Judaizing threat. Over against this heresy, Paul summarizes the distinctives of his theology in verses 7–11.

The rest of the chapter may be viewed as Paul's attempt to apply these theological concerns to the Philippian situation.

IV. Doctrinal Polemics (3:1–4:1)

➤ A. Judaizers as the Context for Theology (3:1–6)

B. The Essence of Pauline Theology (3:7–11)

C. Practical Theology (3:12–4:1)

A. Judaizers as the Context for Theology (3:1–6)

The heading chosen for this section is intended not only as a description of Paul's approach in this letter but as a reminder that the apostle regularly gives expression to his theology in response to false teaching and that the Judaizing groups constituted the main front of Pauline opposition.^[1] Even the Epistle to the Romans, which appears to many a calmly reasoned dissertation, must surely be understood as a set of answers to the kinds of objections the Judaizers had been advancing for years against Paul's gospel of justification by grace through faith. (The subsequent history of the Christian church, we may add, illustrates in detail how God's people come to a clearer understanding of the truth when they are confronted with error.) In this particular passage Paul launches an attack on the Judaizers (vv. 2–3), and that leads to an apparent boasting of his "spiritual credentials" prior to his conversion (vv. 4–6). We may thus outline these verses as follows:

1. Paul on the offensive (3:1–3)
2. Mock boasting (3:4–6)

Exegesis and Exposition

¹Finally, my brothers, rejoice in the Lord. [There is a matter, however, about which I must remind you.] Writing to you again about the same things is certainly not troublesome for me, while for you it is a safeguard. ²[So I do not mind repeating:] keep your watch for those [who claim to be spiritually pure but are unclean] dogs, whose works [are not good as they proclaim but rather] evil, whose [ritual practices must be characterized as] mutilation. ³[Yes, their insistence on fleshly circumcision is a perversion,] for we [believers in Jesus] are the [true people of God], circumcised in the heart—we who worship "by the Spirit of God" and place our boast in Christ Jesus while placing no confidence in the flesh.

⁴[Do not misunderstand my words:] I myself have plenty of reasons to place confidence in the flesh. Indeed, if anyone else thinks he has reason to place confidence in the flesh, I have much more: ⁵circumcised [in strict accordance with the law] on the eighth day, a pure Israelite, from the tribe of Benjamin—[in short,] a Hebrew of the Hebrews. Moreover, I was a Pharisee with regard to the interpretation of the law, ⁶I proved my zeal by persecuting the church, [and I was so scrupulous] with regard to the righteousness set forth in our Jewish law that I was never found to be at fault.

1. Paul on the Offensive (3:1–3)

The strong words of verse 2 are reminiscent of Paul's language in portions of 2 Corinthians (e.g., 11:13–15) and especially Galatians (1:8–9; 5:12; 6:12–13). In both of those letters the objects of Paul's attack were not unconverted Jews but rather false teachers who identified themselves with the broad Christian community; the same appears to be true here in Philippians. Hawthorne follows the view that the opponents were non-Christian Jews, but this is highly unlikely, because it has not been characteristic of Jewish people to pressure Gentiles to be circumcised. Moreover, as we shall see, the view that the Philippians' opponents were Judaizers (Jewish Christians who insisted that Gentile Christians submit to the Mosaic law, including circumcision) fits very well the contents of chapter 3 as a whole. In any case, Paul warns the Philippians to be on guard (βλέπετε, blepete; see the first additional note on 3:2) against these dangerous opponents.

To appreciate the force of verse 2, we need to realize that Paul's language is not accurately described with such terms as “insulting” or “abusive” (contrast Fee 1995: 290n21). Paul has carefully chosen his terms to achieve intense irony, not merely to use derogatory speech. The very first item clearly illustrates our problem, for the pejorative sense of the English dog is normally applied insultingly to people considered worthless and vulgar. For the Jews, however, the term had a distinctly religious sense: it referred to the Gentiles, those people who, being outside the covenant community, were considered ritually unclean. When Jesus drew a comparison between the Syro-Phoenician woman and dogs (Mark 7:27), the woman recognized the analogy not as a vulgar insult but as a religious statement. Paul, therefore, is making a startling point: the great reversal brought in by Christ means that it is the Judaizers who must be regarded as Gentiles (cf. the comments on 2:15–16).

This theme is further developed with the next two descriptions. The phrase τοὺς κακοὺς ἐργάτας (tous kakous ergatas) does not merely indicate “people who do what is wrong” or “sinners” (cf. Ps. 6:9 LXX et al.; Matt. 7:23; Luke 13:27). In this context, the phrase is surely meant to refute the Judaizers’ claims that they were doing the works of the law (erga nomou; cf. Gal. 3:10; 5:3;). Genuine good works are done only by true believers (2 Cor. 9:8; Eph. 2:10; Col. 1:10). The Judaizers were earthly-minded false brothers, whose teaching led to the works of the flesh (Gal. 2:4; 5:13–21; Phil. 3:18–19). In this way too they were spiritual Gentiles.

The third phrase is a scathing description. These Judaizers, the apostle argues in effect, do not deserve to be called “the circumcision”^[2] but rather “the mutilation” (κατατομή, katatomē). For the sake of clarity, the NASB translates “the false circumcision,” but Paul intends more than that. When Jewish rituals are practiced in a spirit that contradicts the message of the gospel, these rituals lose their true significance and become no better than pagan practices. For the Gentile Christians of Galatia, the adoption of Jewish ceremonies was tantamount to becoming enslaved all over again to their pre-Christian rituals (Gal. 4:9). Moreover, Paul’s reference to mutilation in Gal. 5:12 may be, among other things, an allusion to barbaric pagan customs. Here in Philippians Paul takes the Judaizers’ greatest source of pride and interprets it as the surest sign that they have no share among God’s people.

Continuing this line of thought, Paul draws the antithesis sharply by affirming that Christian believers have now become the true Jews: “it is we who are the circumcision” (v. 3, with the pronoun ἡμεῖς, hēmeis, in an emphatic position). This conception is exceedingly important for Paul, who was often accused of rejecting the OT message (cf. Acts 21:21). The Epistle to the Romans in particular is intended to answer that charge by arguing that the gospel, far from opposing the OT, fulfills it.^[3] Similarly, chapter 3 of Galatians is devoted to proving that those who are united to Christ through faith are the true seed of Abraham (see esp. vv. 7, 29; cf. also 6:16, “the Israel of God,” though the significance of this phrase is disputed). In accordance with this basic Pauline conception, the polemic of Phil. 3 begins with an unequivocal assertion of the great spiritual reversal: Judaizers are the new Gentiles, while Christian believers have become the true Jews.^[4]

Worthy of note is the way in which Phil. 3:3 describes the distinctive qualities of the true people of God. While any of several descriptions would be valid, Paul chooses in this passage to call attention to three features, two of them positive and the last one negative. First, Paul identifies God's people as those "who worship by [or in] the Spirit of God." Whatever the differences between Pauline and Johannine theology, one can hardly deny that this phrase is conceptually equivalent to John 4:23–24 (true worshipers worship God "in the Spirit and in truth"). In neither passage, however, is the point being made that true worship is inner rather than external (so Hawthorne et al.). The reference is surely to the eschatological significance of the Holy Spirit's outpouring. The coming of Christ, in other words, has ushered in the new age of salvation, and the Holy Spirit is the sign of this redemption (cf. Ridderbos 1975: §§11–12, 38, and passim). Those who belong to Christ are part of the new order (2 Cor. 5:17); they have the Spirit and are thus able to offer worship that is pleasing to God (Rom. 8:8–9; 12:1).

In the second place, God's people "glory in Christ Jesus" (Fee 1995: 302 rightly sees an "implicit Trinitarianism" in this verse). The real force of this phrase can best be appreciated by contrasting it with the third descriptive clause, "put no confidence in the flesh." Although the verbs "to glory" (καυχάομαι, kauchaomai) and "to have confidence" (πέποιθα, pepoitha) are not precisely synonymous, they may nevertheless be said to occupy the same semantic field when Paul uses them to point out the object of faith. To believe in Jesus Christ is to put one's confidence in him; but if Jesus Christ is our grounds for confidence, he is therefore also our grounds for joyful pride and for exultant boasting (similarly Calvin; cf. also my comments on 1:26).

The exact opposite of this attitude is that which places confidence in the flesh (σάρξ, sarx), that is, in oneself, in one's natural achievements. "For in the term 'flesh' he includes everything external in man that he could glory in, as will appear from the context; or, to express it briefly, he calls 'flesh' everything that is outside Christ" (Calvin). Hawthorne (1983: 127), however, is also right in suggesting that "Paul seems to cast at least a passing glance at the rite of circumcision" (cf. Gal. 6:12–13). The circumcision of the flesh, as preached by the Judaizers, became for Paul the symbol of a total mindset that is opposed to the Spirit and leads to death (Rom. 8:5–8; Gal. 5:16–21).

2. Mock Boasting (3:4–6)

Starting a new paragraph with verse 4 may appear strange. As far as the syntax is concerned, the first clause of that verse (lit., though I myself have confidence even in the flesh) is joined, though somewhat loosely, to verse 3. Conceptually, this division can be justified, since verse 4a in effect introduces Paul's "boasting" in verses 4b–6. The quotation marks are needed around this word because the apostle will quickly proceed to tell us that the virtues enumerated here constitute a spiritual liability (vv. 7–8).

Why then mention them at all? In a remarkable passage, 2 Cor. 11:16–12:11, Paul felt compelled by the circumstances in Corinth to point out his apostolic credentials, but his poignant hesitations in that passage confirm that he reckoned any such defense to be mere foolishness (2 Cor. 12:7, "I have become a fool; you yourselves compelled me"). The situation in Philippi, though in some respects markedly different from what Paul faced in Corinth, may have been partially analogous. The Judaizers who threatened the Philippian community no doubt appealed to their impressive Jewish credentials in support of their message. With considerable reluctance, and not for purely rhetorical effect, Paul felt pressured to remind the Philippians that his own background was second to none.

There is, however, an important difference between the two passages. In 2 Corinthians, Paul's object is to demonstrate his apostolicity (rather than his Jewishness) in the face of personal attack. Here in Philippians the listing of credentials has a more direct theological purpose—to serve as a foil for his exposition of the Christian message in verses 7–11.

As most commentators have pointed out, the seven clauses of verses 5–6 naturally fall into two groups: the first four items describe privileges that Paul acquired simply by virtue of his birth, while the last three focus on voluntary choices of his own. (Moreover, the second group of clauses is marked by the syntactical parallelism of the repeated kata.) Most of the items are self-explanatory, and Lightfoot emphasizes the logical progression characterizing the first four: (1) circumcision on the eighth day sets Paul apart from pagans and from groups that may have performed circumcision in an invalid way; (2) the claim to being "of the nation of Israel" distinguishes him from proselytes, that is, from converts to Judaism, sometimes perceived as "second-class"; (3) because even a true Israelite might come from an insignificant or even disreputable part of the nation, Paul also points out his distinguished Benjamite descent (cf. O'Brien 1991: 370–71); (4) finally, his family could not be accused of having adopted

Hellenistic ways—he was “a Hebrew of Hebrews” (see the additional note on 3:5).^[5]

As an adult, Paul continues, he chose a religious lifestyle that left no doubt with regard to his commitments. Significantly, the matters he brings up in this context parallel clearly his claims in Gal. 1:13–14, where the Judaizing opposition forms the backdrop for Paul’s comments (though in that passage the precise point is different). Here in Philippians he first indicates that the particular approach he chose for his interpretation of the law was that of the Pharisees. This perspective, which emphasized the “ancestral traditions” (Gal. 1:14; this phrase corresponds to the rabbinic oral law), was widely perceived as the one most faithful to Scripture; the Judaizers, at any rate, could not have asked for anything more impressive. (Cf. Acts 22:3; 23:6; 26:5, see also the additional notes on 3:6.)

In the second place, Paul proves the sincerity and intensity of his prior religious commitment by using “an expression of intense irony, condemning while he seems to exalt his former self: ‘. . . I persecuted, imprisoned, slew these infatuated Christians; this was my great claim to God’s favor’” (Lightfoot). The language in Gal. 1:13 is more forceful: “I used to persecute intensely the church of God and tried to destroy it.”

The last clause in verse 6 has caused a great deal of discussion. It reads, literally, “according to the righteousness which is in the law having become faultless.” Paul can hardly be claiming that he was sinless—or even that prior to his conversion he thought he was sinless. Such a concept was quite foreign to Jewish theology; moreover, no reasonable reading of Rom. 7:5–11 is consistent with it. But having said that, some exegetical questions remain. What is “the righteousness which is in the law” (δικαιοσύνην τὴν ἐν νόμῳ, dikaïosynēn tēn en nomō)? And how do we define “faultless” (ἄμemptος, amemptos)? Moreover, does this expression tell us anything about Paul’s sense of guilt in connection with his conversion?

Let us consider this last question at once. In an article that has had considerable influence, Krister Stendahl (1963) argued that “in Protestant Christianity . . . the Pauline awareness of sin has been interpreted in the light of Luther’s struggle with his conscience,” whereas in fact “it is exactly at that point that we can discern the most drastic difference between Luther and Paul.” A major piece of evidence for Stendahl is Phil. 3:6, where, he claims, “Paul speaks about his subjective conscience” (Stendahl 1963: 200–201).^[6]

But Stendahl's interpretation of this verse cannot be sustained. Paul's statement is in fact quite irrelevant to the question regarding his conscience. The apostle is countering the Judaizers' claims by showing his credentials; all of the items listed are accessible, objectively verifiable claims. It would be almost meaningless to introduce a subjective, and therefore greatly biased, judgment at the very end. The point is rather that anyone interested could have "checked the record" and found that Paul had never been charged with transgressing the law. Consequently, no one could argue that his conversion to Christianity was attributable to prior failure in his Jewish lifestyle.

If we recognize this factor, our other two questions can be answered much more easily. The word "faultless" does not at all reflect any illusion regarding sinlessness; rather, it must be viewed as a fairly standard way of expressing exemplary conformity to the way of life prescribed by the OT. One thinks particularly of Zacharias and Elizabeth, who are described as "walking in all the commandments and requirements of the Lord without fault [amemptoi]" (Luke 1:6).

We could use the word external to characterize the obedience in view, but unfortunately that term has come to suggest mere formality or even hypocrisy. Such a negative connotation is certainly not in view either in Luke 1:6 or in Phil. 3:6. Yet in both cases the obedience is external in the sense that it is the only kind that can be observed by human beings and thus verified. "Paul, then, was in the judgment of men holy and free from all blame" (so Calvin, who distinguishes between literal and spiritual righteousness). Accordingly, "the righteousness which is in the law" describes an observable standard of conduct, that is, the righteous way of life prescribed by the OT. This peculiar form of expression anticipates the deeper issue that the apostle is about to discuss: Is such a way of life identical with the righteousness that God requires? The answer will be given in verse 9.

It must be added that when the apostle speaks about the law, he has in mind not the law in a historical vacuum but rather the law as it was understood and used in first-century Judaism. Calvin goes so far as to say: "Paul uses the word 'law' loosely for the teaching of religion, however much corrupted it was at that time, as Christianity is today in the Papacy." Without drawing the distinction that sharply, we must recognize that Paul had just spoken in verse 5 of his prior commitment to Pharisaism as providing the proper understanding of the law. To accept such an interpretation could easily lead to a false sense of spiritual achievement, for in some important respects rabbinic exegesis relaxed the divine standard (cf. Silva 1986). Poignantly, the “rich young ruler” of the Synoptics (Mark 10:17–27) exemplifies what inevitably happens when God’s requirements are brought down to our level: a frightful unawareness that our own efforts are quite inadequate to win God’s favor.

Additional Notes

3:1. τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν (to write the same things): This clause is often taken as a reference to Paul’s “repeated appeals to joy” (Hawthorne), whereas Martin (1976: 124) prefers to link it with the preceding passage (“the same things” that Epaphroditus will describe when he delivers the epistle). The difficulty with the first interpretation is in trying to explain why an appeal to joy should be described as something “safe” to do (Hawthorne’s attempt seems forced). As for Martin’s view, nothing in the text indicates that Epaphroditus was commissioned to deliver a message. As suggested in the comments above, it seems better to link τὰ αὐτὰ with the passage that follows. On the reasonable assumption that Paul had on previous occasions expounded his theology to the Philippians, he expresses a mild apology for going over familiar ground. (Cf. in this regard Gal. 5:21, καθὼς προεῖπον, and possibly 1:9, ὡς προειρήκαμεν.)

3:2. βλέπετε (lit., see): The threefold repetition of this verb, the use of alliteration (κυνάς, κακούς, κατατομήν), the studied irony of the passage, and several other features make this section a striking example of Paul’s rhetorical power (see Hawthorne 1983: 123).

Kilpatrick (1968: 146–48) argues that βλέπω, when used with the accusative, nowhere clearly means “beware of” (that nuance, he claims, resides in the accompanying preposition ἀπό or the particle μή); that the simple meaning “consider, take note” is preferable here; and that therefore the connection of this verse “with what has gone before is not as abrupt as is usually assumed.”^[7] In the references listed by him where the verb is followed by a μή clause, however, that clause simply completes the thought partially expressed by the verb (if the thought is made explicit by a direct object, such a clause is unnecessary). The English “watch the fire” usually implies a warning, such as “lest it burn up the house.”^[8] Schenk (1984: 253, referring to Lohmeyer and BDR §149) rightly sees no difficulty in taking the imperative as a warning (cf. now O’Brien 1991: 353–54; Fee 1995: 293n36).

The present imperative is often (but inconsistently) used with reference to action already in progress. Even though the rendering “keep/continue watching” must be regarded as an overtranslation, I have adopted something comparable in my paraphrase because the context does indicate that Paul is repeating a warning he had previously addressed to the Philippians.

3:2. τοὺς κακοὺς ἐργάτας: By linking this phrase to the parallel in 2 Cor. 11:13 (ἐργάται δόλιοι, deceitful workers), Koester (1961–62: 320) sees here a reference to missionaries whom Paul regarded as malicious laborers (see the sharp critique by Schmithals 1972: 118–20).

3:3. οἱ πνεύματι θεοῦ λατρεύοντες (who worship by the Spirit of God): This reading is attested by all the major textual families, and its grammatical difficulty (it has no expressed object) suggests originality. The reading θεῷ is easier (“who worship God in the Spirit”) and therefore suspect, particularly because its external support is inferior. The omission of the noun in P⁴⁶ is tantalizing, but this reading is best explained as another instance of carelessness by the scribe (see introduction, “Textual History”).

3:4. καίπερ: According to Hawthorne, the clause introduced by this particle begins a new sentence and Paul does not complete it: “Although I have good reasons for putting confidence in myself. . . .” Hawthorne then supplies the ellipsis with the additional words, “I will not do so.” There seems to be little reason, however, to depart from the common punctuation: a comma at the end of verse 3 with a period at the middle of verse 4, so that the participial clause in question is viewed as dependent on the main clause of verse 3.

3:5. Ἑβραῖος ἐξ Ἑβραίων: This phrase appears to have a climactic intent and thus could be understood in the sense of “pure-blooded”; certainly a denial that he had any mixed ancestry would fit in well with the previous items, which focus on qualities related to his birth. Most writers, however, see in this phrase a reflection of the Hebrew/Hellenist distinction (cf. Acts 6:1). “Hellenistic Judaism” normally designates Jews of the Dispersion (living outside Palestine) who adopted Greek as their language and whose way of life reflected their non-Jewish surroundings. This generalization can be very misleading, because many Hellenistic Jews were distinguished by their orthodoxy (while numerous Palestinian Jews were thoroughly Hellenized). Having been born and reared in Tarsus, however, Paul might have been suspect in this regard, and so here he makes it clear that his family upbringing was irreproachable.

3:6. δικαιοσύνην τὴν ἐν νόμῳ: This phrase is only one of several Pauline remarks about the Torah that have caused considerable controversy. Implicit here (and explicit elsewhere) is a “criticism” of the Torah that is difficult to reconcile with Paul’s positive remarks in other passages. If Paul’s negative comments refer to the OT law without qualifications, we face an unbearable tension within the pages of Scripture. In an attempt to escape this dilemma, some writers have argued that νόμος for Paul can be shorthand for Jewish legalism. Though this interpretation contains a measure of truth, it seems exegetically improbable, and the theological inferences drawn from it are disturbing. [9] As pointed out in the exposition above, Paul surely has in mind the OT law (not first-century Judaism as a distinct entity), but just as surely his negative remarks reflect the way that law was handled by his Jewish opponents. [10]

3:6. γενόμενος: “having carried it so far . . . that human judgment finds nothing in me to blame in this respect!” (Meyer).

IV. Doctrinal Polemics (3:1–4:1)

A. Judaizers as the Context for Theology (3:1–6)

► B. The Essence of Pauline Theology (3:7–11)

C. Practical Theology (3:12–4:1)

B. The Essence of Pauline Theology (3:7–11)

Having made clear in verses 4–6 that he had not been a failure in Judaism, the apostle now proceeds to give an account of his conversion. In verses 7–8 he explains that he came to view his previous successes as spiritual bankruptcy. This assessment leads to a succinct description of his doctrine of justification (v. 9), his experience of sanctification (v. 10), and his hope of glorification (v. 11). The cogency of this summary—to say nothing of its impact on the reader—is what warrants the heading for this section.

Paul, no doubt, would have been the first to protest that the gospel he proclaimed is too rich to be reduced to a few sentences. But if such a feat could be accomplished, the passage before us would be it. Profoundly theological yet intensely personal (it is the only passage where Paul uses the expression “my Lord”), these verses ban any attempts to characterize the gospel as either doctrine or life. Although we have here doctrinal teaching, the reader is hardly aware of the abstractions involved—so naturally and effectively does Paul allow that teaching to flow out of his spiritual experience.^[1]

A further indication of the character of this passage is the way it appears to echo 2:5–11. The sequence of privilege-death-exaltation suggests such a connection, and this is confirmed by explicit verbal parallels: hēgeomai (2:6; 3:7–8), morphē (2:7; cf. symmorphizō, 3:10), heuriskō (2:7; 3:9), kyrios (2:11; 3:8). When one further considers that the Christ-hymn itself blends crucial theological concepts with acute practical concerns, a clearer picture develops regarding the function of 3:7–11 in the argument of the letter. The enemies of the cross (3:18) pose a practical threat to a weakened Christian community that is already in danger of becoming schismatic. Paul’s prescription is doctrine: understand the content and character of your faith, he says, and you will stop being intimidated by the barking of your opponents.^[2]

The passage will be treated under two headings:

1. Spiritual bankruptcy (3:7–8)
2. Spiritual wealth (3:9–11)

Exegesis and Exposition

⁷Nevertheless⁷, whatever category of virtues used to be my assets, these very things I have learned to consider a loss for the sake of Christ. ⁸Let me be clearer⁷: I continue to consider everything [achieved in the flesh] to be a loss for the sake of the incomparable value of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord. It is for his sake that I have willingly sustained the loss of all things—indeed I consider them no better than dung so that I may gain Christ.

⁹[What do I mean by “gaining” Christ? I want] to be found in union with him, [that is, I want] to have not my own righteousness, which comes from the law, but the righteousness that comes through faith in Christ, God’s own righteousness based on faith. ¹⁰[My goal then is] to know him, namely, [to experience] the power [that was manifested in and that arises from] his resurrection, and ¹¹to participate in his sufferings⁷ by being molded in accordance with his death—¹¹hoping that I may yet reach the resurrection ¹²from⁷ the dead.

1. Spiritual Bankruptcy (3:7–8)

It has become common in recent biblical scholarship, when referring to Paul’s Damascus experience, to emphasize its character as a call (cf. Gal. 1:15) and to tone down the element of conversion (e.g., Koester 1982: 2.100). It is true of course that Paul understood his experience as a divine calling; and it is also true that he did not view his new commitment as an abandonment of the God of Israel. But Phil. 3:7–8 leaves no doubt that Paul’s submission to Christ constituted a conversion in its deepest sense. These verses repeatedly set a negative evaluation of his prior way of life against a positive description of his new experience:

| The Old Life | The New Life |
|------------------------------|---------------------------------|
| these I have reckoned a loss | for Christ |
| I reckon all things loss | for the value of knowing Christ |
| I have lost all things | for whom [i.e., for Christ] |
| I reckon them dung | that I may gain Christ |

If we focus on the items under the left column, we notice a significant progression of thought; clearly, Paul expresses with increasing intensity his sense of dissatisfaction with those things that had previously been most important to him. For example, the direct object in verse 7, ἅτινα (hatina, whatever things; reinforced with ταῦτα, tauta, these things), becomes πάντα (panta, all things) in verse 8. We need not absolutize the meaning of panta to appreciate its full force. The thrust of the word is clearly established by the context: everything on which Paul might place his fleshly confidence. Because verse 8 begins with a very emphatic combination of five particles,[3] it is clear that Paul intends to reiterate his point in the most forceful terms possible.

One can also detect a note of progression in the shift from the perfect tense ἤγημαι (hēgēmai, I have considered, v. 7) to the present ἡγοῦμαι (hēgoumai, I consider; used twice in v. 8). To be sure, the perfect tense itself is hardly devoid of reference to the present (cf. BDF §§340–42),[4] but given the clear contrast between verses 7 and 8, Paul appears to be exploiting the distinction: “Don’t think I regret my decision—even now I continue to regard every one of those virtues as nothing.” Schenk (1984: 263) notes the lexical connection with 2:3 and with the various occurrences of phroneō; Paul is speaking about a deep-seated resolution and frame of mind.

In addition, we have the most striking progression of all in the change from the noun ζημία (zēmia, loss, vv. 7, 8a) to the verb ζημιόω (zēmioō, [passive] to suffer damage, v. 8b) and then to the potent noun σκύβαλα (skybala, refuse, waste, v. 8c). Most commentators point out, rightly, that the term zēmia itself is rather emphatic; apparently drawing on commercial terminology (but see the second additional note on 3:7), Paul tells us that he now regards his previous “assets” (κέρδη, kerdē) not merely as without worth but as positively damaging, as spiritual “liabilities.” “In the process of reevaluation [Paul] perceived with horror that the things he had hitherto viewed as benefiting him had in reality been working to destroy him because they were blinding him to his need for the real righteousness which God required” (Hawthorne).

And yet the apostle goes even further: what he once regarded highly he now finds revolting. There is no need to downplay the meaning of skybala with such equivalents as “rubbish” (NASB, NIV); while such a meaning is attested (cf. Sir. 27:4—the Greek term could be used of various kinds of filth), a specific reference to excrement is not uncommon and the KJV rendering “dung” is both appropriate and probable.^[5] One must be careful, however, not to conclude that Paul regarded Jewishness in itself as revolting; his sense of identity with his people, as well as passages like Rom. 3:1–2 and 9:1–5, make clear that he continued to appreciate the great value of his heritage.

It was, therefore, not the heritage as such that he revolted against, but the viewing of that heritage as a human right or achievement, thus obscuring one’s need for full dependence on God’s grace. It is difficult not to see here an allusion to Isa. 64:6: “all our righteous deeds are like filthy rags.” Moreover, there is some evidence that the ancients understood skybalon as deriving from to tois kysi ballomenon, “that which is thrown to the dogs” (see Lightfoot). Since popular etymologies play a significant role in the use of language (see Silva 1994: 50), and because Paul had earlier (v. 2) referred to his opponents as “dogs,” we may have here a veiled reference to the Judaizers.

If we now refer back to the chart represented above and focus on the right column, we notice a comparable progression of thought, especially in the three phrases where the name of Christ is expressly mentioned. The first one (v. 7) is simply διὰ τὸν Χριστόν (dia ton Christon, for the sake of Christ), but in verse 8 it is expanded to “for the sake of the incomparable value of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord.”^[6] The significance of this idea for Pauline theology will be discussed in connection with verse 10. One should note here, nevertheless, the forcefulness of Paul’s language. Lightfoot points out a similar expression used by Paul in 2 Cor. 3:10 where the apostle speaks of the glory of the old covenant as being no glory at all in comparison with the ministry of righteousness. Knowing Christ overshadows anything else that might have been considered a gain. Paul had no regrets about having forsaken the source of his earlier pride, for nothing could compare with the knowledge of his Lord.

Finally, Paul expresses the purpose of his conversion with the clause ἵνα Χριστόν κερδήσω (hina Christon kerdēsō, in order that I may gain Christ). Considering the vocabulary of verses 7–8 as a whole, it seems reasonable to find here an echo of Jesus’s words, “What profit will a man have if he gains [kerdēsē] the whole world and suffers the loss [zēmiōthē] of his life?” (Matt. 16:26 and parallels). That question in turn is closely related to the parables of the hidden treasure and of the pearl (Matt. 13:44–46); the protagonist in each of these parables “sells all he has” for the sake of a priceless possession. Whether Paul was familiar with these sayings—and if so, whether he alluded to them deliberately—cannot be demonstrated. In any case, Paul’s own experience constitutes a dramatic illustration of the truth taught by our Lord. Paul recognized the radical antithesis between his former way of life and the new hope offered to him; it was either one or the other. What was required was not a mere adjustment or the incorporation of an additional element—only a total conversion would be adequate. And Paul gladly forfeited his personal achievements to obtain the pearl of great price.

2. Spiritual Wealth (3:9–11)

It is somewhat artificial to break up 3:7–11 at the end of verse 8, particularly because the last words of verse 8 begin a purpose (hina) clause that is continued without grammatical interruption in verse 9. Conceptually, however, there is something to be gained by distinguishing these two subsections. As we have seen, verses 7–8 may be viewed as consisting of four clauses, each of which points out both what Paul has lost and what he stands to gain. The emphasis clearly falls on the negative side: the apostle is intent on asserting that his previous achievements had yielded spiritual bankruptcy. On the other hand, verses 9–11 focus exclusively on the positive side. The gains to which he had alluded in the previous verses are here expanded in considerable detail. It is perhaps not too far-fetched to view the initial καί (kai, and) of verse 9 as epexegetic of the last clause in verse 8: Paul is about to explain what it means to gain Christ.

A striking feature of this passage is the way it reflects a distinction among the three basic categories present in the application of salvation: justification (righteousness through faith, v. 9), sanctification (experiencing the power of Christ’s resurrection as well as participating in his sufferings, v. 10), and glorification (bodily resurrection, v. 11). Some will no doubt object that this threefold classification is an artificial construct deriving from systematic theology and that it should not be imposed upon Paul’s teaching. We may readily agree that in the apostle’s writings these terms have a broader use than they have in modern dogmatics, that several other terms serve to highlight various aspects of salvation (calling, forgiveness, reconciliation, adoption, etc.), and that an exclusive preoccupation with the major loci of systematic theology could distort the Pauline teaching.

On the other hand, one could argue (from this very passage) that the categories of systematic theology themselves derive from Scripture. All scholarly disciplines, of course, develop specialized vocabularies, and it is not surprising that theological terms are given a more restricted meaning than they often have in the biblical text.^[7] Yet it is the Pauline corpus that has provided most of the material for a systematic doctrine of salvation. And in spite of many modern claims to the contrary, there is a basic consistency between Paul's teaching and the classic soteriological formulations, as the following exegesis will seek to demonstrate.

a. Justification (v. 9). It is possible that the long participial clause of verse 9 is structured in the form of a chiasm (cf. Schenk 1984: 310):^[8]

mē echōn (not having) emēn (my)

dikaiosynēn (righteousness)

tēn ek nomou (the one out of the law)

alla tēn dia pisteōs Christou (but the one through faith in Christ)

tēn ek theou (the one out of God)

dikaiosynēn (righteousness)

epi tē pistei (upon faith)

The central thrust of this verse finds expression in the clause τὴν ἐκ θεοῦ δικαιοσύνην (tēn ek theou dikaiosynēn, the righteousness [that comes] from God). The shorter expression dikaiosynē theou provides the keynote to the Epistle to the Romans (1:17; 3:5, 21–26; and passim). Some contemporary scholars have argued that the classic Protestant conception of a righteousness imputed to the believer by God has little to do with Paul's concern. Instead, we are told, the phrase refers to a divine attribute: God's own faithfulness and power in preserving his creation.^[9] Such a meaning, however, is out of the question here in Phil. 3:9. Not only (1) the presence of ek, but also (2) the contrast with "a righteousness of my own derived from the Law," (3) the conception that God's righteousness is something we may have (ἔχων, echōn), and (4) the clear concern of the passage with personal salvation—all of these factors support conclusively the traditional interpretation.

It is very important to note the explicit opposition between the righteousness that comes from God (ek theou) and that which comes from the law (ek nomou). Clearly, Paul conceives of the two as mutually exclusive. Why does he? As has often been pointed out, there is a close relationship between the concepts of righteousness and life in Paul's writings (cf. Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11); one could almost define the one in terms of the other. But since the law cannot give life (Gal. 3:21), then any "righteousness" proceeding from the law is worthless.[10]

Moreover, Phil. 3:9 gives a pejorative description of such a righteousness by calling it ἐμὴν (emēn, mine), that is, of the flesh (vv. 3–4); therefore our own righteousness is mutually exclusive of God's.[11] In short, Paul has given up his own efforts toward becoming righteous through the works of the law. Instead, he now looks outside himself for the righteousness that only God, the righteous judge, can grant—a righteousness that is received διὰ πίστεως Χριστοῦ (dia pisteōs Christou, through faith in Christ), or ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει (epi tē pistei, on the basis of faith).

The translation "through faith in Christ" here and elsewhere in Paul has been disputed from time to time, and in recent times there has been a flurry of publications arguing against it. In particular it has been pointed out that every other Pauline use of pistis with the genitive is certainly to be understood as a subjective genitive; note, for example, "the faithfulness of God" (Rom. 3:3) and "the faith of Abraham" (Rom. 4:12).[12] Now it is certainly possible, in principle, that Paul could have used the expression pistis Iēsou Christou in reference to Jesus's own faith/faithfulness; it is also true that Jesus's obedience plays a central role in Paul's theology (Rom. 5:18–19; and cf. comments on Phil. 2:8). This interpretation, however, faces the insuperable linguistic objection that Paul never speaks unambiguously of Jesus as faithful (e.g., Iēsous pistos estin) or believing (episteusen Iēsous), while he certainly speaks of individuals as believing in Christ. Ambiguous grammatical forms should be interpreted in the light of unambiguous ones, and the very repetition of Gal. 2:16 ("faith in Christ" twice; "we believe in Christ Jesus" once) supports the traditional understanding.[13]

In short, then, Paul asserts that true righteousness is obtained by abandoning one's own efforts and exercising faith. As Rom. 9:30–10:4 makes perfectly clear, Paul understands faith as the opposite of "seeking to establish" one's own righteousness; in that sense, works and faith are indeed incompatible. This perspective is confirmed by the Philippians passage, where pistis takes on a specific nuance through its opposition with those things that Paul, as he has already told us in the previous verses, had renounced. It would therefore not be far-fetched to define faith as “the act of counting as loss all those things that may be conceived as grounds for self-confidence before God.”

Before leaving verse 9, we must note the striking expression Paul uses to introduce and describe his doctrine of justification: “that I may be found in him” (εὕρεθῶ ἐν αὐτῷ, heurethō en autō). One could hardly ask for clearer proof that Paul’s doctrine is no mere abstract speculation. This phrase alone would confirm Lightfoot’s well-known comment that Philippians presents the apostle’s true view of the gospel as “a Person and a Life” (see introduction, “Exegetical History”).

The use of the verb heuriskō perhaps reflects our Lord’s words in Matt. 16:24–26 (though this verb is not found in the parallels, Mark 8:34–37 and Luke 9:23–25): whoever is willing to lose his own life—as Paul was ready to abandon a set of attitudes and practices that had constituted his very existence—for Jesus’ sake (heneken emou; cf. Paul’s use of dia in vv. 7–8) will truly find his life, which is now hidden in Christ, who is our life (Col. 3:3–4). It would be difficult to demonstrate that this is the actual source of Paul’s language, but the comparison with Jesus’s saying suggests a certain elegance in the apostle’s use of what may be a deliberate mixed metaphor, that is, the shift from “I lost everything” to “I was found” (rather than “I found something else”). Surely, a simple identification between “to be found” and “to be justified” (cf. Bonnard 1950: 65; Martin 1976: 131–32) is not satisfactory, much less the view that the verb here is synonymous with “to be” (Schenk 1984: 307).

In any case, Paul’s use of the passive heurethō in this passage may have a special nuance, approaching the sense of “turn out, appear, be shown,” probably in imitation of the Hebrew mš’ (Niphal).^[14] Jesus, through his humiliation, appeared in our human form (2:7) and thus identified himself with us so that we might “be completely united with him.” The words in quotations are the rendering of 3:9 by GNB; this is certainly an overtranslation, but it is impossible to deny that Paul’s central concern with the doctrine of union with Christ is present here (cf. NBE, “incorporarme a él”). But if that is so, it reinforces the view that the forensic or judicial strand cannot be made the all-embracing focus of Paul’s theology. “Not justification by faith but union with the resurrected Christ by faith (of which union, to be sure, the justifying aspect stands out most prominently) is the central motif of Paul’s applied soteriology” (Gaffin 1978: 132).[15]

b. Sanctification (v. 10). Grammatically, this verse is best understood as a second purpose clause introduced by the genitive articular infinitive τοῦ γνῶναι (tou gnōnai, that I may know). This construction parallels the hina clause that begins at the end of verse 8 and continues through verse 9 (however, see the additional notes on 3:10). This infinitive rules three objects: αὐτόν (auton, him), δύναμιν (dynamin, power), and κοινωνίαν (koinōnian, fellowship). A literal rendering suggests three distinct goals: Christ himself, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings (cf. NASB, similarly NIV). But the first kai can plausibly be understood as epexegetic: to know Christ means to experience his resurrection and to share in his sufferings.

This verse should probably be viewed as an expansion of the earlier phrase in verse 8, “the incomparable value of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord.” Already in the introduction to this letter (1:9–11; recall the terms epignōsis, aisthēsis, and dokimazō) the apostle had alerted his readers to the significant role played by knowledge, particularly as it bears on the doctrine of sanctification. More fundamental, however, is the personal element intrinsic to that knowledge, and here in 3:10 Paul appears to define knowing Christ as the believer’s experiencing of Christ’s own death and resurrection. Paul’s teaching on this subject is unusually rich, with many interweaving ideas contributing to a coherent whole. Consider, for example, the way in which the following three passages help to elucidate each other:

| | |
|------------|--|
| Phil. 3:10 | “to know [gnōnai] . . . the power [dynamin] of his resurrection [anastaseōs]” |
| Rom. 6:4 | “Christ was raised [ēgerthē] from the dead through the glory [doxēs] of the Father” |
| 2 Cor. 4:6 | “the light of the knowledge [gnōseōs] of the glory [doxēs] of God in the face of Jesus Christ” |

Without minimizing the differences among these passages, we can profit by identifying some common threads. Thus, for example, although 2 Cor. 4:6 does not explicitly mention the resurrection, the other two references make clear that this event is indeed what Paul has in view.[16] Similarly, even though the Romans passage does not use “knowledge” vocabulary in reference to our relationship with Christ, there is good reason to relate the concept of knowing Christ with that of being baptized into union with him (Rom. 6:3).

Most significant for our purposes, however, is the way that Rom. 6:1–11 and 2 Cor. 3:4–4:6 aid us in our understanding of Phil. 3:10. The Romans passage, of course, is a locus classicus on the doctrine of sanctification. Arguing against those who would infer (from the message of justification through faith apart from works) that Paul’s teaching leads to complacency in sin, the apostle insists, in the most forceful way possible, that those whom God justifies he also sanctifies. Our identification with the risen Lord means that we must “walk in newness of life” (Rom. 6:4). Thus, when Paul in Philippians speaks about experiencing the power of Christ’s resurrection, he has in mind our spiritual transformation into the image of Christ—a transformation that takes place as we behold his glory (2 Cor. 3:18).

Growth and transformation, however, are not to be had without pain. Paul had earlier (1:27–30) reminded the Philippians of the struggle, conflict, and suffering that characterize the Christian citizen.^[17] He had also underlined (2:6–11) the shameful death to which their own Lord had submitted himself. But now, in one of his most poignant statements, Paul speaks of his goal to experience a share in the sufferings of Christ and to be formed after the manner of Christ’s death.

There is a profound mystery in these words. The parallels with Rom. 6:1–11 (“we who died to sin,” “baptized into his death,” “buried with him,” etc.) make it clear that Paul is not thinking primarily of his physical death.^[18] Precisely what is involved in Paul’s doctrine of the believer’s dying with Christ has been hotly debated. Ridderbos has argued persuasively that Paul has in mind “the participation of the church in the death and burial of Christ in the one-time, redemptive-historical sense of the word.”^[19] When Christ died, his people, whom he represented, died with him—his death became theirs. This identification or union with Christ is appropriated by the believer through baptism, but there is also a sense in which that death is reenacted in the spiritual experience of conversion and sanctification.

The participation of believers in Christ’s death includes not only their definitive breach with sin (the main concern of Rom. 6) but also the sufferings they undergo by virtue of their union with Christ. This latter idea seems to be the concern of Phil. 3:10 (but note Hawthorne’s objections). The connection between the apostle’s suffering and the Lord’s passion surfaces in Col. 1:24 and is prominent in 2 Cor. 4:10–12. This latter passage (which admittedly is not an exact parallel to Phil. 3:10) is significant in that Paul describes his own sufferings as a “carrying about in our body the death [nekrōsin] of Jesus. . . . For we who live are always being delivered over to death [thanaton] for Jesus’ sake. . . . So death [thanatos] works in us” (cf. also 2 Cor. 1:9; see further O’Brien 1991: 404–5).

Believers who do not experience the perils to which Paul refers need not think they have been left out (cf. comments on 1:29–30). Their baptism represents a deeply traumatic experience; nothing less than the terrifying picture of Christ’s death does justice to the seriousness of that experience. To be sure, they have been infused with new life, but there is a sense in which they continue to bear the death of their Lord—in their spiritual disappointments and frustrations, in their struggles with the prince of darkness. The stinging reality of Christian suffering is our reminder that we have been united with Christ. More than that, it is the very means God uses to transform us into the image of his Son.

c. Glorification (v. 11). Syntactically, verse 11 sustains a loose relationship with verse 10 and may appear to be something of an afterthought. There is, however, a very close conceptual relation between the end of verse 10 and the concern of verse 11: the latter statement sets forth the goal that gives meaning to Paul’s sufferings. The idea is expressed most clearly in Rom. 8:17, “we suffer with him so that we may also be glorified with him” (sympaschomen hina kai syndoxasthōmen; cf. also 2 Tim. 2:11–12). Although some have suggested that here in verse 11 Paul does not have in view the physical resurrection (cf. Hendriksen 1962: 169–70), it is difficult to see how his phrasing (τὴν ἐξανάστασιν τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν, tēn exanastasin tēn ek nekrōn) could mean anything else. Of course, Paul looks forward to the resurrection not merely because he is interested in a new body. The resurrection represents perfection at every level of his existence, and so it is mentioned here as the culmination of his spiritual pilgrimage.

A serious problem is raised, however, by the apparent tentativeness of Paul’s language, εἴ πως καταντήσω (ei pōs katantēsō, lit., if somehow I may reach—the idea is obscured by the NASB: “in order that I may attain”). Because Paul elsewhere speaks with great assurance about his future hope (e.g., Rom. 8:30–31; 2 Tim. 1:12), it might seem legitimate to look for a way of interpreting these words that removes the element of doubt. One could argue, for example, that Paul’s tentativeness “is not in reference to the reality of his resurrection . . . but in regard to the way in which it will be his” (Martin 1976: 136, who thinks the possibility of martyrdom is in view; cf. also Motyer 1984: 170; O’Brien 1991: 413). Unfortunately, I can find no evidence to support this interpretation. True, the word “somehow” is a common English equivalent for pōs, but the semantic area common to these two words is that of indefiniteness (see below), not means or method.

The most common solution is to see in the expression not at all a note of “uncertainty but rather humble expectation and modest self-confidence” (J. Müller 1955: 118). This interpretation contains an important element of truth, as we shall see, but it seems a mistake to deny the note of doubt or uncertainty. The adverb pōs (enclitic) serves as an indefinite modal particle; it often adds a slight nuance that cannot be easily reproduced. The specific combination ei/ean pōs commonly designates uncertainty (cf. LSJ 1562, meaning I), and this is surely the case in the NT. The NIV, for example, translates Acts 27:12: “the majority decided we should sail on, hoping to reach Phoenix.”^[20]

It is always important, in this connection, to distinguish between the firm, unmovable object of our hope and our subjective apprehension of it. The apostle Paul, in spite of his maturity, and though writing under inspiration, was neither omniscient nor sinless. This passage is not the only place where he expresses a note of self-distrust (cf. esp. 1 Cor. 9:27); moreover, his concern to strengthen Christian assurance is always balanced by a desire to prevent presumptuousness (1 Cor. 10:12; Gal. 4:19–20). In the very nature of the case, any warnings against complacency and a presumptuous spirit are susceptible to misinterpretation. Indeed, someone unfamiliar with the apostle’s teaching could deduce, from Phil. 3:10–11, that Paul perceived he was in the process of earning the resurrection by his willingness to suffer. Of course, such an interpretation would undermine the perfectly clear thrust of verses 7–9; yet it serves to remind us of the way in which this epistle repeatedly juxtaposes divine grace with personal responsibility (see esp. comments on 2:12–13).

Calvin is quite correct that Paul wants to impress upon us the difficulties, struggles, and hindrances that attend the believer’s life. The apostle would remind us that even he “must watch and pray continually to abide in the fellowship of Christ’s suffering . . . for only in that way the glorification with Christ . . . will be attained” (J. Müller 1955: 118). While we ought not, therefore, to minimize the note of self-distrust present in this verse, it would be unjust to generalize from it and deduce that Paul did not enjoy assurance of salvation. Too many other passages, as well as the whole tenor of his teaching, make clear that he did—and that he expected his readers to share in that assurance.^[21]

We may still ask, however, why Paul's striking expression should occur in this particular passage. The only reasonable answer, as others have suggested, is that Paul is already anticipating what he will stress in verses 12–14. It is apparent that some perfectionist tendencies were present in the Philippian community. The apostle wants to give no encouragement to that, but perhaps he senses that the glowing descriptions of verses 8–10 could be misused. Accordingly, the subsequent verses qualify his previous remarks to prevent a perfectionist interpretation. In that light, verse 11 can be seen as a transitional statement: although it brings the previous passage to a culmination, it also anticipates the qualifying remarks that follow.

Additional Notes

3:7. ἀλλά: The conjunction is omitted by some early Alexandrian and “Western” witnesses (P⁴⁶, the original hand of Sinaiticus, A, G, etc.). The verse seems to cry out for a transitional particle,^[22] but this very fact may have led scribes to add the conjunction. Hawthorne argues that the lack of a conjunction serves to stress the radicalness of Paul's change of outlook. On the other hand, P⁴⁶ is characterized by omissions of this sort (see introduction, “Textual History”); moreover, the weight of B, D, and the vast majority of witnesses is considerable. A firm decision seems impossible, and the editors of UBS4 are wise in including the conjunction within brackets. (Cf. also the omission of καί in v. 8.)

3:7. κέρδη . . . ζημίαν (gain . . . loss): That these terms could be used in the context of business practices is clear; what is not so clear is whether or not such a connotation was normally present when the terms were used in more general contexts (the corresponding English terms, for instance, can often be viewed as dead metaphors). In support of the view that Paul is indeed exploiting the metaphor is the repeated use of commercial terms in 4:14–15 (see comments there). Meyer sees some significance in the shift from plural to singular: “This one disadvantage he has seen in everything of which he is speaking.”

3:7. διὰ τὸν Χριστόν: Hawthorne objects to the rendering “for the sake of Christ” (NASB, NIV, etc.) because it suggests that Christ benefited by Paul's decision. Such an inference is completely unnecessary, however, because “for the sake of” (like διὰ with the accusative in Greek) may indicate the goal of one's actions, as in Plato, Republic 7.7 = 524C (LCL 2:159): the mind contemplates the great and the small distinctly διὰ τὴν σαφήνειαν, “for the sake of clarity” (where there is of course no reference to benefiting the object of the preposition). Paul's threefold use of διὰ in verses 7–8 indicates the reason for which he has counted his former benefits as nothing. It was with a view to gaining Christ that he changed his way of thinking; the last clause of verse 8 (ἵνα κερδήσω Χριστόν) unambiguously makes explicit the thought of the previous clause (cf. Lightfoot).

3:8. ἀλλὰ μενοῦνγε καί (paraphrased above with “Let me be clearer”): It is not easy to reproduce the force of the Greek. The combination μεν οὖν itself “presents a considerable diversity of usage” (Denniston 1954: 470). [23] Thrall argues persuasively that the basic combination ἀλλὰ καί (and ἀλλά γε καί in Luke 24:21) is progressive; the addition of μενοῦνγε must therefore be seen as an emphatic reinforcement. This conclusion affects the text-critical question of whether the καί is original. This conjunction, like ἀλλά in verse 7, is omitted by Ψ⁴⁶ (the document is defective at this point, but there is clearly no room for the conjunction), by the original hand of Sinaiticus, and by the later Alexandrian witnesses 33 and 1739. We must follow Thrall (1962: 15) in her judgment that the omission “is obviously an attempt [but not necessarily deliberate?] to simplify what appears at first sight to be an extremely cumbersome group of particles.” She properly refers to the ἀλλὰ καί of 1:18 as a close parallel. As we noted in that verse, however, Paul did not merely introduce an additional element; he needed to explain his response to adversity. Similarly in 3:8 the transition may be viewed as explanatory or even mildly corrective: “Do not infer from what I have just said that my decision was limited or temporary—there is much more to it.” (The GNB rendering—“Not only those things; I reckon everything as complete loss”—overemphasizes the shift from ἄτινα to πάντα, but this understanding is supported by Meyer.)

3:8. τῆς γνώσεως Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ: A good deal of scholarly discussion has focused on the meaning of γνώσις in Paul, particularly the question of whether the term should be understood within the context of Hellenistic religions. The gloss in BDAG 203 (s.v. γνώσις, meaning 2), “personal acquaintance with,” is generally accepted by scholars, regardless of their position on that debate.

3:9. καὶ εὐρεθῶ ἐν αὐτῷ: Appealing to 2 Cor. 5:3, Hawthorne argues that the verb here means “to be found when surprised by death.” This suggestion in effect injects into the verb the general meaning of the context in 2 Cor. 5:3. Hawthorne, however, also refers to an old note in which Moffatt (1912–13: 46) appeals to Epictetus (Disc. 3.5.9; 4.10.11–12) in support of an “eschatological meaning” for εὐρεθῆναι. The parallels are indeed striking, and Paul’s own reference to death in verse 10 may seem to lend some support to this interpretation. Against it is the unlikelihood that Paul would have viewed union with Christ and “having God’s righteousness” as future, rather than present, blessings. Yet could one argue that this present/future distinction represents a false dichotomy? While Paul argues emphatically that the believer has already been justified (e.g., 1 Cor. 6:11), he can also speak of justification on the last day (Rom. 2:12–13). Gnllka (1976: 194) argues that Phil. 3:9 refers to a communion with Christ that endures to the end, and so what is in view is neither the present only nor the end-time only, but a unity characterized by tension (“vielmehr sind beide als spannungsvolle Einheit gesehen”). In spite of these considerations, it seems much preferable to understand εὐρεθῶ along the lines suggested in the exposition above.

3:9. ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει: “on the ground of faith” (Acts iii.16), added at the end with solemn emphasis” (Meyer; cf. also his comments regarding the syntactical relationship between verses 9 and 10).

3:10. On the grounds that “no one can participate in His resurrection, who has not first participated in His death,” Lightfoot argues that the thought expressed by κοινωνίαν παθημάτων αὐτοῦ logically precedes τὴν δύναμιν τῆς ἀναστάσεως αὐτοῦ. This analysis suggests a chiastic arrangement:

- A the power of his resurrection
- B and the fellowship of his sufferings
- B' being conformed to his death
- A' if somehow I may reach the resurrection from the dead

Although there is some plausibility in this argument, it appears to suggest that the first phrase has future reference and therefore does not describe the believer's present sanctification—an unlikely interpretation in the light of Rom. 6:1–11.

3:10. [τὴν] κοινωνίαν [τὴν] παθημάτων αὐτοῦ: Both definite articles are missing in a strong group of witnesses that include \mathfrak{P}^{46} , the original hand of Sinaiticus, and Vaticanus. Hawthorne (1983: 129) believes that later scribes added the article to mark κοινωνίαν “as a totally separate entity exactly parallel with” δύναμιν; later (144) he states that these words are “to be taken closely with the first phrase” because δύναμιν and κοινωνίαν share the same definite article (the reasoning seems circular). However, the scribe of \mathfrak{P}^{46} is notorious for his omissions (see introduction, “Textual History”), and so the decision is difficult (cf. also on ἀλλά, v. 7). Even if we omit τὴν, it is pressing the grammar to say, on the basis of that omission, that “the power of the resurrected Christ and the fellowship of his sufferings are not to be thought of as two totally separate experiences, but as alternate aspects of the same experience” (Hawthorne 1983: 144).

3:11. τὴν ἐξανάστασιν τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν: The fact that this is the only attested occurrence of the compound ἐξανάστασις has created more discussion than it probably deserves. The strong tendency in Hellenistic times to “strengthen” verbs in this way, plus the possibility that Paul may have, consciously or unconsciously, looked for stylistic variety (after using the simple form in v. 10), adequately account for its use. Meyer, who believes the two forms should not be distinguished, suggests that the compound “is to be explained solely from the more vividly imaginative view of the event which the apostle has before him” (i.e., ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς).

The majority of manuscripts read τῶν νεκρῶν instead of τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν. The preposition, however, is attested by all major Alexandrian witnesses (except the Bohairic version) and by most “Western” witnesses. Lightfoot points out that the absence of the preposition would suggest a reference to the general resurrection (as in 1 Cor. 15:42), but I find it difficult to sustain that the preposition would be required if the author wanted to refer specifically to “the resurrection of Christ and of those who rise with Christ.”

IV. Doctrinal Polemics (3:1–4:1)

A. Judaizers as the Context for Theology (3:1–6)

B. The Essence of Pauline Theology (3:7–11)

➤ C. Practical Theology (3:12–4:1)

C. Practical Theology (3:12–4:1)

The function of this passage in its larger context is not immediately clear. Even though verse 12 must surely be viewed as correcting any false interpretations of Paul's words (cf. BDF §495.3 on the rhetorical device epidiorthosis), one may ask whether the reference is only to the immediately preceding verse or to some other element(s) in verses 9–11. The answer to that question may be colored by one's identification of the opponents in view. Although it is fairly clear that verses 12–16 (with vv. 18–19) reflect a polemic against some group in Philippi, opinions differ markedly regarding the character of the group.

Lightfoot (1868: 70), for example, believes that the Judaizers are no longer in view; rather, verse 18 indicates the presence of individuals “who professed the Apostle's doctrine but did not follow his example.” In verses 12–16, “though St Paul speaks of himself, his language seems really to be directed against the antinomian spirit, which in its rebound from Jewish formalism perverted liberty into license” (Lightfoot 1868: 151, where he refers to Rom. 6:1). The idea that libertines are in view has been taken to an extreme by Schmithals (1972: 82–115), who denies that even the earlier part of the chapter was directed against Judaizers, and who argues that the polemic throughout the chapter is directed against a well-defined group of antinomians—an organized missionary movement composed of Jewish Christian Gnostics (as in 2 Cor. 11:13).

Accepting the connection between Paul's opponents and some early form of Gnosticism, H. Koester nevertheless denies that they were libertinists. On the contrary, “they were Christian missionaries of Jewish origin” who preached “a doctrine of perfection based upon the Law and the continuation of Jewish practices.” They believed that a complete fulfillment of the Law was possible—they had achieved it already and could boast about it!—and brought about the possession of the eschatological promises in full, that is, the Spirit and spiritual experiences of such heavenly gifts as resurrection and freedom from suffering and death. (Koester 1961–62: 331)[1]

For his part, Klijn (1964: 281–82) denies the Gnostic connection altogether and returns to Lohmeyer’s identification of the opponents as non-Christian Jews (cf. also Hawthorne); like Koester, Klijn believes that the whole chapter attacks the view that perfection can be “attained by strict observance of the law.” On the other hand, Gunther (1973: 2, 98, and passim), who has identified eighteen different hypotheses among modern scholars, prefers to see a united Judaizing (= Jewish Christian) group of opponents reflected throughout the letter.[2]

Rejecting all attempts to see a single front in the Philippian opposition, Jewett has written two penetrating articles (1970a; 1970b) that canvas the entire debate. His conclusions, reminiscent of Lightfoot, are that 3:2 refers to Jewish Christian missionaries, while the enemies reflected in 3:18–19 were (a) former members of the Pauline congregation in Philippi who had been expelled during his visit there, who (b) denied the saving efficacy of the cross, (c) indulged and boasted in libertine behavior in the areas of food and sex, and (d) believed that in their exalted self consciousness they had already obtained final salvation. (Jewett 1970a: 382)[3]

In sorting out the various viewpoints we must note that perfectionism and antinomianism are not mutually exclusive principles. Very probably, the heresy to which 1 John is addressed consisted of individuals who reckoned themselves to have achieved spiritual perfection, yet perfection of such a sort that encouraged wrongful behavior. And for an example of the “compatibility” between an emphasis on the fulfillment of the Jewish law and a less than commendable lifestyle, we need only think of the churches in Galatia; those Christians had capitulated to Judaistic (legalistic) forces, yet Gal. 5:13–26 makes clear that this move had not prevented antinomian behavior in their midst. In other words, even if Phil. 3:19 describes libertine behavior (a debatable point; see the exegesis of that verse), one should not conclude hastily that the enemies thus characterized adopted a different theological position from that of the “mutilators” mentioned in 3:2.

Another preliminary observation is this: recent writers who prefer to view a single front of opposition to Paul have in my opinion the better argument, but this thesis too needs to be qualified by the text itself, which seems to make a clear distinction between error that is external to the Philippian church (3:2) and error that is found within the congregation

(3:15–16). The latter, to be sure, may well reflect some kind of influence from the outside, but one cannot deny that the admonition of verse 15 (“Let us have this frame of mind”) is addressed to a different group of people from those who are described as “dogs” in verse 2. If so, verses 15–16 throw some light on the question of Philippian disunity. Perhaps the disunity was the result of some members having a sense of spiritual superiority. In any case, even this conclusion leaves open the question whether verses 18–19 refer to an altogether different group; we must postpone a decision, however, until we can discuss those verses in detail.

For the moment, we must appreciate the practical force of Paul’s words in verses 12–16. Might the doctrinal character of the previous section (vv. 9–11) be perceived as abstract and thus irrelevant? Conversely, might its personal and upbeat tone appear out of touch with the hard realities of daily existence? To counteract any misunderstandings, the apostle moves immediately to acknowledge his sense of personal frustration and yet to affirm that the theology he has just delineated wells up in hope (vv. 12–14). He then appeals to the Philippians themselves to bring their behavior in line with their doctrinal commitment if they wish to grow in their spiritual knowledge.

The whole unit may be outlined as follows:

1. Frustration and hope (3:12–14)
2. Growth through obedience (3:15–16)
3. Patterns of behavior (3:17–19)
4. Heavenly citizenship (3:20–4:1)

Exegesis and Exposition

^{3:12}[You should deduce from my words that] it is not as though I have already attained my goal [“or have already received God’s final verdict of justification”] or have already been perfected. Rather, I am pursuing the goal with the hope of reaching it—after all, I have already been reached by Christ “Jesus”. ¹³Yes, brothers, even I do not “yet” reckon to have reached my goal. But one thing [is certain]: forgetting whatever is behind me and exerting myself [to reach] what is ahead, ¹⁴I am pursuing the goal [on which I’ve set my eyes] in order to win the prize promised by God’s heavenly call, [which came to me] through Christ Jesus [or by God’s heavenly call. (And I exert this effort) by virtue of my union with Christ Jesus].

¹⁵Therefore, [listen to me,] any [of you who consider yourselves] perfect: we should all have this frame of mind [I have described]. And if you have the wrong frame of mind [or if you continue to have disagreements] on some particular point, God will reveal to you even that fact. ¹⁶However, [be clear on this point: if we wish to grow spiritually,] we must conduct ourselves in a manner that is consistent with [the level of growth] to which God has brought us " ".

¹⁷Brothers, be united in imitating me, and also watch those whose conduct conforms to the pattern you see in us. ¹⁸[I need to stress this point] because [you are faced with] many whose conduct—well, I have often told you about them and now I repeat with tears in my eyes, " " that they are enemies of what the cross of Christ [stands for. ¹⁹As for these people who think they have arrived]—their true destination is destruction. [Though they claim to serve God] they worship their visceral impulses, while that in which they glory will prove to be their disgrace. In short, their frame of mind [is not that which we should have in Christ Jesus but] is molded by earthly things.

²⁰[So you must reject this earthly behavior and instead follow our example,] because the commonwealth that rules our conduct is in heaven, from where we also eagerly await our Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ. ²¹It is he who will transform our humble bodies "in conformity with" his glorious body by the power with which he is able even to subdue all things to himself.

^{4:1}Therefore, my beloved and longed-for brothers, you who are the source of my joy and boasting, it is thus [by fixing your eyes on this great hope] that you must stand firm in the Lord, "beloved".

1. Frustration and Hope (3:12–14)

The statement of verse 12 ought not to be interpreted apart from verses 13–14, particularly in view of the parallelism between these two sections:

A I have not attained [lambanō] (12a)

B I pursue [diōkō] that I may reach [katalambanō] (12b)

A' I do not reckon to have reached [katalambanō] (13a)

B' I pursue [diōkō] toward the goal (13b–14)

The first set (A-A') consists of negative statements; here Paul makes clear what he is not claiming. These negatives help to correct any false impression that may arise from verses 9–11. The second set (B-B') consists of affirmations; because he does not yet possess all he expects, he presses on with confidence and determination.

If we focus first on the negative clauses, we are immediately impressed by the variety of terms Paul uses here to express one basic concept:

λαμβάνω (lambanō, take, obtain, receive), τελειόω (teleioō, [passive] be finished, accomplished, perfected), καταλαμβάνω (katalambanō, attain, grasp, seize). Whatever semantic distinctions we may be able to discover (here or elsewhere) among these verbs, we must give greater weight to the simple fact that all three have the same referent in view, namely, the attainment of Paul's ultimate goal.

The precise force of katalambanō (a matter of some debate) must be gauged by the fact that in verse 12b it occurs in (syntagmatic) opposition to diōkō. This linking of the two verbs is rather common in Greek literature generally. Herodotus (Hist. 9.58 [LCL 4:231]), for example, quotes a Persian as saying with reference to the Greeks: “They must be pursued till they be overtaken” (διωκτέοι εἰσὶ ἐς ὃ καταλαμφθέντες).^[4] In 1 Cor. 9:24–25 Paul, using explicit athletic imagery, opposes the verb trechō (run) to both lambanō and katalambanō. And in Rom. 9:30–31 the apostle, speaking of righteousness, opposes diōkō to both katalambanō and phthanō (cf. the use of this last verb in Phil. 3:16).

All of this evidence casts doubt on the view (e.g., Martin 1976: 137; Hawthorne) that here in Phil. 3 the verb katalambanō is used of intellectual apprehension, as with the English “grasp.” And yet there is surely a conceptual link between Paul’s expressions in these verses and the goal of spiritual knowledge. Not only has Paul already formulated his aim as that of knowing Christ (v. 9), but the contrast between the active and passive voices of the verb in verse 12b finds an intriguing parallel in 1 Cor. 13:12, “but then I shall know even as I have been known” (τότε δὲ ἐπιγνώσομαι καθὼς καὶ ἐπεγνώσθην).

A remaining question, however, is the problem of identifying the direct object of (kata)lambanō. Because the object is not expressed in Greek, this issue has received considerable attention—too much attention, in fact. Commentators appear to forget that the omission of a direct object (especially if that object could be expressed with a pronoun) is very common in Greek, though almost never permissible in English. Particularly fanciful is the view that Paul omitted the object deliberately as a polemic against the perfectionists’ claim that they had attained everything.^[5] A Greek writer will not sense any need to express the direct object if that object has just been mentioned. In this particular case the object is undoubtedly tēn exanastasin (the resurrection, v. 11).

It must be emphasized, however, that the resurrection stands here not as an isolated event, but as the culmination of the Christian hope. This hope, in turn, had previously been expressed in terms of “knowing Christ” (v. 10). That the person of Christ himself stands in the background of Paul’s comments is confirmed by verse 12b, where the inverse relationship involves Christ’s seizing of Paul (cf. Dibelius; BDAG 519, s.v. καταλαμβάνω, meaning 1). Moreover, because the figure of the race has already been invoked, Paul's language also anticipates verse 14, τὸ βραβεῖον (to brabeion, the goal).[6]

These remarks should not be taken to mean that all of the nouns mentioned or implied in the context (Christon, brabeion, ta panta) serve as the grammatical object of (kata)lambanō. Linguistically, the implied object is simply tēn exanastasin, but because of the theological implications of the resurrection, Paul's thought in this passage encompasses a great deal more: the ultimate spiritual redemption of our body (Rom. 8:23), when all things shall be freely given to us (Rom. 8:32).

But Paul uses still another concept to describe his goal, namely, perfection. We must remind ourselves once again that Paul is here stressing what he did not possess. Clearly implied in these comments is a sense of frustration; the reality of his present existence did not conform totally to the purposes expressed in verses 9–11. The admission of failure is also suggested by his need to forget what was behind (v. 13b). In short, Paul was not perfect, though he longed for perfection.

The verb teleioō occurs nowhere else in Paul's letters, though the noun telos and the adjective teleios occur with some frequency (thirteen times and seven times, respectively). This set of terms can be used, in a relative sense, of present experience, as in 1 Cor. 14:20, "in your thinking be mature [teleioi]," and possibly in this very passage (v. 15, but see comments below). Such a use may involve more than moral growth; it possibly reflects Paul's conviction that God's eschatological promises are a present reality for believers (cf. esp. 1 Cor. 10:11; for a broader discussion, see Silva 1976–77). The "future-eschatological" sense, however, is also clearly established, as in 1 Cor. 1:8; 13:10 (disputed by some); 15:24; Eph. 4:13. In the present context, this is the only acceptable meaning; to be perfected consists of attaining the last and ultimate goal, blamelessness at the Day of Christ (Phil. 1:10—see comments there).

We may then direct our attention to verses 12b and 13b–14, where Paul, having already expressed his disclaimer, tells us what he did claim: he was in hot pursuit! I have already commented on certain aspects of these clauses and so it is not necessary to dwell on them, but a few exegetical questions still need attention. Note first that Paul's purpose in pursuing is expressed with εἰ καὶ καταλάβω (ei kai katalabō, lit., if I may even seize, whether I may indeed seize). The construction reflects the same element of self-distrust that Paul had brought out in verse 11.

A second, and interesting, question is the force of ἐφ' ᾧ (eph' hō) in verse 12b. The traditional interpretation takes this construction as indicating aim or purpose (“that for which”), in which case the clause acts in effect as the object of the verb katalabō: “if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus” (so KJV, similarly NASB, NIV). This view is preferred by some writers and can be supported grammatically (cf. Robertson 1934: 605). Against it, however, is the omission of the direct object with elabon (v. 12a) and with kateilēphenai (v. 13a), which suggests that katalabō too is used absolutely. Moreover, the construction eph' hō is clearly used as a causal expression by Paul in Rom. 5:12 and 2 Cor. 5:4 and makes very good sense here: “I hope to reach it inasmuch as I myself have already been reached by Christ.”[7]

In any case, the clause as a whole provides an unexpected twist to the argument. Stylistically powerful, the statement in effect balances off Paul’s self-distrust with the confidence that is grounded in Christ’s work of grace. We do not exaggerate to see in verse 12 one of Paul’s most significant soteriological formulations. The verse makes a strong theological point regarding the tension between human agency and divine sovereignty, but the point is made within the framework of a personal confession regarding the Christian experience—a marvelous verse indeed.

Paul then expands the idea in verses 13b–14, where in the first place human effort is emphasized by the development of the race metaphor: I do not look back at my failures or successes; I strain forward with all determination so that I can win the prize. Yet all of this exertion and mental absorption take place in response to God’s upward calling (τῆς ἄνω κλήσεως, tēs anō klēseōs); the notion of the divine call, more than any other, signals Paul’s conscious dependence on God’s grace (cf. Gal. 1:6, 15).

Precisely because the term klēsis has such a theologically charged nuance for Paul, one must question Collange’s view (followed by Hawthorne) that the expression is used after the analogy of the Greek games, in which, after each event, a herald announced the name of the winner. No evidence has been put forth that this noun (or the verb kaleō) was used in that context. If anything, the call for Paul comes at the beginning of the race, and the prize to which[8] we are called may be described in various ways, such as conformity to Christ (Rom. 8:29–30), fellowship with Christ (1 Cor. 1:9), the peace of Christ (Col. 3:15), sanctification (1 Thess. 4:7), salvation through sanctification (2 Thess. 2:13–14), eternal life (1 Tim. 6:12). The “prize” is clearly the culmination of the whole work of salvation—with all its implications—to which God has called us. That is the great hope that sustained Paul, even in the midst of discouragement and frustration.

But what is the force of the last phrase, “in Christ Jesus”? On the surface, the simplest and most natural construction is with the immediately preceding phrase: God’s call is mediated through Christ (Schenk 1984: 269 adds that this formal phrase constitutes an abbreviated repetition of the last clause of verse 12, “I was reached by Christ Jesus”). Meyer argues that the expression should be construed with the main verb, diōkō, and that it “is emphatically placed at the end as that which regulates all his efforts.” Aside from B. Weiss, modern scholars have paid no attention to this view, but the weight of Chrysostom and other Greek fathers should not be dismissed lightly.^[9] I have thus included above an alternate translation that incorporates this understanding of the syntax.

2. Growth through Obedience (3:15–16)

These two short verses present a variety of textual and exegetical problems. The section consists of three sentences, each of which contains two clauses:

1. As many as are perfect / let us think this.
2. If you think differently / God will reveal this also to you.
3. Only to what we have attained / by the same we should walk.

Now the first sentence creates no serious difficulties. The word τέλειοι (teleioi, perfect) may be a straightforward reference to spiritual maturity, or more probably it may reflect, by a touch of irony, the group of believers whose error Paul is addressing (cf. 1 Cor. 8:1; Rom. 15:1; and see Lightfoot).^[10] In any case, Paul is simply exhorting the Philippian church to share the humble perspective (φρονῶμεν, phronōmen) to which he has just given expression.

The third sentence is more difficult, partly because the style is very condensed, partly because of the textual variants found in the manuscripts. It is clear, however, that the two problems are related; the difficult syntax led to scribal corrections, such as “let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing” (so KJV and the majority of manuscripts; see the second additional note on 3:16). Paul’s point, however, is very clear: the Philippians must behave in a manner consistent with what truth they have already received. Lightfoot appropriately refers to John 7:17, where our Lord regards submissiveness to God's will as a condition for greater knowledge. Growth comes through obedience.

It is the second sentence, however, that has proved especially baffling. As Martin (1976: 141) puts it, Paul gives the impression of "saying that agreement with his teaching is a matter of indifference and that those who dispute his statements are entitled to their views." Hawthorne, following Beare (1959: 131), argues that Paul is acknowledging his inability to change the Philippians' attitude by apostolic command. This suggestion does not really solve our problem, however. For the Philippians to have resisted a change in their attitude would have been tantamount to rejection of the apostle's authoritative teaching.

Meyer cannot be too far from the truth when he comments that someone could "have in general the same frame of mind which Paul has represented in himself, and to which he has summoned his readers; but at the same time an isolated concrete case (τι) may occur, which a man cannot fit into the φρονην in question, and regarding which he is of opinion that he ought to be differently minded." Such an individual, he continues, would be morally inconsistent, lacking the discernment for which the apostle prayed at the beginning of the letter.

Perhaps we should also consider the possibility that the statement in question is a reference, not so much to disagreement with what Paul has just said, but to the more general disputes that the congregation has experienced. Certainly Paul's frequent use of phroneō throughout the letter consistently speaks of the need for greater unity among the Philippians. More specifically, the touto phronōmen of verse 15 probably corresponds to the touto phroneite of 2:5. If so, Paul is not precisely asking for agreement with his statements in the preceding verses (that point would go without saying!) but rather reiterating the great theme of the epistle—an appeal to humility for the sake of the congregation's unity. To that exhortation, Paul adds the comment "But if there continue to be some disagreements among you, I trust that God will soon bring unanimity in your midst."

3. Patterns of Behavior (3:17–19)

So as to reinforce his exhortation, Paul contrasts two dramatically opposed patterns of behavior, his own and that of the enemies of the cross. The apostle elsewhere appeals to believers to imitate him (e.g., 1 Cor. 4:16; 11:1; 2 Thess. 3:7–9), but this particular passage carries a special force by virtue of what he has just conceded in verses 12–14. Paul asks the Philippians to follow his example, not because he has achieved perfection, but because he is struggling in the same race that they are running (cf. 1:30).^[11] Quite naturally, therefore, he identifies himself with them by the use of an affectionate and humble term, “brothers.”

Moreover, Paul adds, there are others whom the Philippians can observe and use as examples. The strong word σκοπεῖτε (skopeite, notice, consider, look out for, keep one’s eyes on) may be an echo of the apostle’s prior reference to “the goal” (skopos; see comments on v. 14) or even of his command that the Philippians look out for the interests of others. At any rate, it is worthwhile noticing this continued emphasis on the concentration and singleness of purpose that are required of believers as they seek to grow in sanctification.

The imperative skopeite may also reflect a contrast with the blepete of verse 2;^[12] considering the Judaizers, or watching out for them, must not prevent the Philippians from keeping their eyes on the positive examples that God has provided for them. Whether or not Paul intended a link between verses 2 and 17, he certainly saw the need for pointing out to the Philippians that there is a pattern that they must avoid (vv. 18–19). Unfortunately, the identification of the group whom Paul labels as “the enemies of the cross” is plagued with difficulties.^[13]

The apparent force of verse 19 is that it refers to immoral and licentious people. The phrase ὧν ὁ θεὸς ἡ κοιλία (hōn ho theos hē koilia, lit., whose god is their belly) can be naturally understood as a reference to gluttony, with perhaps a broader allusion to their sensuousness and self-centeredness. (In Rom. 16:17–18 Paul speaks of those who cause divisions and who instead of serving Christ serve “their own belly,” tē heautōn koilia.) The following phrase, καὶ ἡ δόξα ἐν τῇ αἰσχύνῃ αὐτῶν (kai hē doxa en tē aischynē autōn, their glory is in their shame), would then appear to describe sexual immorality, whereas the last clause, οἱ τὰ ἐπίγεια φρονοῦντες (hoi ta epigeia phronountes, who set their minds on earthly things), could be viewed as a more general reference to their worldliness.

Most commentators have found this interpretation persuasive,^[14] though they differ among themselves as to the theological background of the “enemies.” This approach faces some serious obstacles, however. First, such a sudden concern with antinomianism seems quite out of character in this letter. Up to this point there has been no hint that moral laxness was a problem—actual or potential—in the Philippian community, and nothing in what follows points in that direction either (unless one would wish to argue that 4:8 reflects a comparable concern). When more than one plausible interpretation faces the interpreter, preference should normally be given to the one that reinforces, rather than “disturbs,” the thrust of a passage (cf. Silva 1994: 153–56). If the reference is to libertines, they appear to come from nowhere and to go nowhere.

Second, it seems rather unusual that Paul would describe antinomians as enemies of the cross. The apostle’s emphasis on the message of the cross serves as part of his polemic against a Jewish understanding of salvation (cf. 1 Cor. 1:23; Gal. 3:1; 5:11; 6:12–14). And because the term “dogs” is used in the Psalms with reference to the enemies of God’s people, one must wonder if the people being described here do not belong to the same group mentioned in verse 2.

But is it possible to understand the details of verses 18–19 as a reference to Judaizers? According to some interpreters, the word koilia should be viewed as an allusion to Jewish concerns over food regulations (cf. the use of the term in Mark 7:19). Indeed, the parallel reference in Rom. 16:18 may reflect the Jewish-Gentile food controversies that Paul addresses in Rom. 14. There is however no real evidence for such a lexical meaning, and the context of Phil. 3 nowhere prepares us for it.

On the other hand, one should not quickly assume that koilia must refer to sensual appetites either. The more appropriate word to use in this connection would be gastēr (cf. the references given by Meyer and Lohmeyer). The noun koilia designates the lower cavity of the body.^[15] Because the viscera were perceived as the seat of one’s driving forces, this term had a close relation with kardia (heart). In a negative context such as this one, however, koilia might naturally symbolize fleshly impulses. There is much to be said, therefore, for the view (adopted by Gnilya 1976: 206 and others) that this term is a strong expression roughly equivalent to sarx (flesh). If so, the reference is not to a specific kind of misconduct—whether licentiousness or legalism—but to a frame of mind that is opposed to the pneuma (Spirit) and that may manifest itself in a variety of ways.^[16]

The word aischynē too has been interpreted with specific reference to Jewish practices. According to this interpretation, the term alludes to the sexual organs and thus indirectly to circumcision. If so, the phrase of which it is a part may be viewed as sarcasm. What these Judaizers boast about (circumcision) is in fact a source of shame. Here too, however, we are faced with a lack of lexical evidence to support such a use.

It seems more likely that the word refers neither to immoral behavior nor to circumcision but should rather be viewed in light of 1:20, where the cognate verb aischynomai is contrasted with the passive of megalynō (magnify, glorify), just as here the noun is contrasted with doxa. If so, the noun speaks of the objective disgrace that falls on those who come under divine judgment and is thus roughly synonymous with ἀπώλεια (apōleia, destruction; at the beginning of 3:19). Whatever these individuals consider their ground for glorying will turn out to be their destruction.

The clause in question, incidentally, is a clear allusion to Hos. 4:7. In verse 6 of that passage the people are said to be rejected as priests because of their lack of knowledge (cf. Phil. 3:8, 10), then follows this condemnation: “The more they multiplied, the more they sinned against me; I will change their glory into shame [LXX: tēn doxan autōn eis atimian thēsomai].” This reference to disobedient Israel parallels the allusion to Deuteronomy in Phil. 2:14–15 and thus indirectly supports the view that here in Phil. 3:17–18 Paul has the Judaizers in mind.

As for the last descriptive clause, ta epigeia phronountes, there is no need to take it as a reference to antinomianism. The thought as a whole is meant to contrast the touto phroneite/phronōmen of 2:5 and 3:15 and so could easily be understood as alluding to a spirit of selfishness and superiority. The term epigeia contrasts specifically with οὐρανοῖς (ouranois, heaven) in 3:20 and with anō in 3:14. One is immediately reminded of Col. 3:2, “Set your mind [phroneite] on what is above [ta anō], not on what is on the earth [ta epi tēs gēs],” an exhortation that has as its background not the danger of libertinism but that of submission to human regulations (Col. 2:16–23).^[17]

It would appear then that the descriptive clauses in Phil. 3:19 do not by themselves specify the nature of the heresy in view. Rather, they are strong characterizations of the fleshly mind and are thus applicable to a variety of situations. The only phrase that perhaps gives us more specific information is “the enemies of the cross of Christ” (v. 18), which, as we have already noted, is most naturally understood as a reference to Judaizers. This view would seem to be supported by the cogency of Paul’s argumentation throughout the chapter (a point stressed by many, particularly Schenk 1984:

291). Whether one accepts this identification or not, it is still possible to appreciate the force of verse 19. Insofar as the group in view represents a pattern of behavior to be shunned by the Philippians, we may argue that Paul is here characterizing an extreme manifestation of the selfishness that was already threatening the Philippian community and that was reflected in the church's lack of unity (cf. introduction, "Distinctive Teaching").^[18]

It remains to be pointed out that these verses are charged with considerable emotion. The syntax of verse 18 falters (see the third additional note on 3:18), and Paul's deep concern is expressed both by a note of insistence ("I have often said and now I say") and by a mention of his tears (καὶ κλαίω, kai klaiō). Though the apostle uses the verb klaiō elsewhere (Rom. 12:15; 1 Cor. 7:30), this is the only explicit reference to his own weeping. Several other passages, however (cf. 2 Cor. 7:2–16 and 1 Thess. 2:17–3:10), give clear witness to Paul's emotional sensitivity. His tears, as he thinks of the enemies of the cross, would seem to preclude any thought of personal vindictiveness when he states that their end is destruction.

4. Heavenly Citizenship (3:20–4:1)

The connection between this passage and the preceding statement (vv. 18–19) is not immediately clear; this ambiguity may be responsible for the substitution of gar (for) with de (but, now) in several early citations and other witnesses. Some modern commentators (e.g., Hawthorne) stress the difficulty and argue that verses 20–21 were originally composed in a different context. Because these verses share some interesting features with 2:5–11,^[19] and because one can detect a mild (certainly unstructured) rhythm here, some scholars have argued that this passage may have been (part of) an early church hymn. Not many have been persuaded, however, and the standard editions of the Greek text cautiously set these verses in regular prose format.

The supposed contextual difficulties, as a matter of fact, have been greatly exaggerated. To begin with, the conjunction gar is frequently used by Paul as a transitional particle; therefore one can hardly insist that it must introduce the cause for the immediately previous statement.^[20] More important than the conjunction, at any rate, is the clear and explicit contrast between the last clause of verse 19 (earthly-mindedness) and the first clause of verse 20 (heavens).

Moreover, the predominant thought of this section flows out of the exhortation of verse 17. Verses 18–19, though not parenthetical, are intended to reinforce that exhortation. Because the Philippians’ need to follow the right example was Paul’s main concern, verses 20–21 too were meant to support the apostolic command—and what better reason is available than the reminder that their true citizenship is a heavenly one?

Indeed, the broader contextual appropriateness of these verses becomes clearer when we notice that they bring to a conclusion the theme introduced in 1:27; cf. especially the reoccurrence of politeuomai (as the noun politeuma, v. 20) and stēkō (4:1; note also synathleō in 4:3). If 2:6–11 is indeed an early hymn, it seems likely that here in 3:20–21 material from that hymn “has been deliberately and skillfully adapted to produce a correspondence which would suit the apostle’s purpose at this stage in his argument” (Lincoln 1981: 88).

We should note that this climactic section of the body of the letter consists of a statement of fact (v. 20a), followed by an expression of hope (vv. 20b–21), which in turn provides the basis for reiterating (in 4:1) the exhortation of verse 17 (indeed, the ethical imperative of the whole letter). The statement of fact in verse 20a (note the emphatic position of ἡμῶν, hēmōn, our) is intended to provide a contrast with “the enemies” frame of mind (note v. 19, φρονοῦντες, phronountes, setting the mind). The point is then that our attitude is determined by the heavenly character of the commonwealth to which we belong.

Some debate has surrounded the meaning of politeuma; “citizenship,” “colony,” “homeland,” “commonwealth” are some of the suggested renderings. There is much to be said for Lincoln’s (1981: 99, 101) thesis that the particular nuance in view is active and dynamic: “the state as a constitutive force regulating its citizens.” We may therefore infer that, whether or not politeuma should be rendered “citizenship,” the idea of citizenlike behavior is dominant in Paul’s thinking (see comments on 1:27). That kind of behavior is possible, we should add, because the believer’s heavenly power is a present reality.^[21]

What may appear unusual, however, is that Paul does not here draw a direct connection between the fact that we belong to a heavenly commonwealth and the obligations that are therefore incumbent upon us. Rather, Paul proceeds to build his case on the character of the hope that such a commonwealth provides. There is a real pastoral insight here, comparable to John's remark: "Everyone who places this hope [of his appearing] on him purifies himself, just as he is pure" (1 John 3:3).

Similarly Peter, after setting forth the hope of new heavens and a new earth, points out: "Therefore, beloved, since you anticipate these [promises], be diligent to be found by him without spot or blame" (2 Pet. 3:14). Paul himself, of course, often links eschatological hope with ethical commands (Rom. 13:11–12; 1 Cor. 15:54–58; Gal. 6:9; 1 Thess. 5:4–6).

In our passage, the description of hope becomes dominant and is strongly reminiscent of both Jesus's own exaltation (2:9–11) and Paul's earlier expression of hope (3:10–11). The sense of personal frustration we noticed in 3:12–14 can still be detected in the way Paul describes our earthly existence: τὸ σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν (to sōma tēs tapeinōseōs hēmōn, the body of our humiliation—a phrase that recalls Jesus's own humiliation in 2:8; however, Doble 2002 argues for the rendering "our body characterized by humility"). The intensity of the apostle's hope is perhaps underlined by the use of the verb ἀπεκδέχομαι (apekdechomai, await eagerly); the term occurs repeatedly in Rom. 8:19–25, where Paul speaks of our groaning as we anticipate our redemption. Finally, even the word σωτήρ (sōtēr, Savior)—rarely used by Paul, except that it occurs ten times in the Pastorals—indicates that the apostle looks to the future for his salvation, that is, for deliverance from the miseries and frustrations of the flesh (cf. Rom. 7:24; 8:10–11; 1 Cor. 15:42–44, 50–54).

What needs stressing, however, is that the whole of verse 21 is a long relative clause that modifies κύριον Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν (kyrion Iēsoun Christon, the Lord Jesus Christ). The focus, in other words, is not some abstract hope but the person of Jesus Christ himself, whom Paul is resolved to know (3:10). We await this Lord because it is he who will transform^[22] our bodies, it is his glorious body that becomes the pattern for ours, and it is his sovereign power that lends certainty to our hope (on the connection between glory and resurrection, see the comments on 3:10).

The allusion to 3:10 becomes explicit with the term σύμμορφον (symmorphon, having the same form; possibly recalling morphē in 2:6–7); those who have been conformed to his death will surely be conformed to his resurrection (cf. also Rom. 6:5). The same adjective is used in Rom. 8:28 to describe God's foreordaining of his people to be conformed to the image of his Son. In that verse eikōn rather than doxa is used, but in the following verse the culmination of this process is expressed with the phrase “these he also glorified” (edoxasen).

Special attention should be paid to the emphasis with which Paul describes the transforming power of Christ: κατὰ τὴν ἐνέργειαν τοῦ δύνασθαι αὐτὸν καὶ ὑποτάξαι αὐτῷ τὰ πάντα (kata tēn energeian tou dynasthai auton kai hypotaxai autō ta panta). This rather involved clause is difficult to translate. The NASB reads: “by the exertion of the power that he has even to subject all things to himself.” More idiomatic as well as accurate is the NIV: “by the power that enables him to bring everything under his control.” The point, quite clearly, is that Christ’s great eschatological power—that power that abolishes all earthly authority, making all enemies, even death, a footstool (1 Cor. 15:24–28; Heb. 1:13; 2:6–8)—assures the fulfillment of his promise. Nothing can thwart God’s saving purposes; what he has begun he will bring to completion (Phil. 1:6; for a broader discussion, see Nebeker 2000).

With that marvelous assurance established, the apostolic command is surely a light and easy yoke: “stand in the Lord” (4:1). The call to perseverance, so eloquently sounded in 1:27–30, is repeated here as Paul’s simple, but most basic, exhortation. Yet it is not couched in authoritarian terms but expressed with warm affection. In a way not quite paralleled elsewhere, the apostle here piles up five distinct terms of endearment—my brothers, beloved, longed-for, my joy, my crown—before uttering the command. And after the command, he repeats the term “beloved” so as to leave no doubt regarding his attitude toward them.

The terms ἀδελφοί and ἀγαπητοί (adelphoi, brothers; agapētoi, beloved) are of course relatively common in Paul. The use of χαρά (chara, “joy”) to designate believers is found in another very emotional passage, 2 Cor. 2:3, and is particularly appropriate in an epistle that stresses Christian joy. The combination of chara with στέφανος (stephanos, crown), however, is found only here and in 1 Thess. 2:19 (with doxa added in 2:20), a point worthy of special note, since these two letters were not written in close temporal proximity. It cannot be an accident that this expression occurs only in reference to Paul’s beloved Macedonian believers. In addition to all this, Paul uses the term ἐπιπόθητοι (epipothētoi, longed-for), a very strong adjective found nowhere else in the NT (it is unattested earlier than Paul), though it recalls the emotional use of the cognate verb in 1:8 (see comments there).

How does one account for so high a pitch of emotion? The answer to this question may depend on whether we construe the exhortation with what precedes or with what follows. The adverb οὕτως (houtōs, thus), which introduces the exhortation, is most naturally taken as a reference back to the preceding verses, and in particular to the great hope that provides the grounds for the implicit call to Christian citizenship in 3:20 (cf. my paraphrase above). Behind this call, however, is the earlier exhortation in 3:17 (Meyer refers specifically to typos), and beyond that the great imperative of the letter as a whole (1:27). In light of this rich background, particularly when contrasted with the depressing behavior of the enemies of the cross, the affectionate language of 4:1 becomes understandable.

On the other hand, there is much to be said for the view that houtōs directs the reader to the more personal—indeed, painful—exhortation of 4:2–3. The structural connection between those verses and the present section is supported by the linking of politeuma (3:20), stēkō (4:1), and synathleō (4:3), the very combination found in 1:27. If so, Paul is very concerned that his motives and attitude not be misunderstood; his emotional tone reveals the spirit of profound love and admiration with which he is about to rebuke the Philippians.

Whatever the precise syntactical force of houtōs, however, one should not assume, with regard to 4:1 as a whole, that a backward and a forward reference are mutually exclusive. On the contrary, the bridging or transitional function of this verse is very clear.^[23]

Additional Notes

3:12. ἔλαβον . . . τετελείωμαι: Robertson (1934: 901) explains the tense variation by saying that the aorist “denies the sufficiency of Paul’s past achievements” while the perfect “denies it as a present reality.” This distinction might be more appropriate when describing the difference between the English simple past tense (which may imply the possibility of intervening events) and the English perfect (which does not).^[24] Precisely because the Greek aorist is not equivalent to the English simple past in this respect, we can frequently use the English perfect to translate the aorist (cf. Rom. 3:23). We could easily argue that ἔλαβον here should be rendered with a perfect (so NASB; NIV).

The most striking textual variant of 3:46 in Philippians is found at this point. After ἔλαβον, this manuscript adds ἢ ἤδη δεδικαίωμαι (or have already been justified). This variant is not unique to 3:46; the insertion is found in the “Western” tradition as well (esp. D* and some Old Latin manuscripts; F and G have δικαίωμαι; the addition was also known to Irenaeus and Ambrosiaster). It is very difficult to account for this reading as an insertion, and the usual explanations are not weighty, e.g., that a copyist added it thinking that otherwise “the Divine side of sanctification was left too much out of sight” (H. Kennedy 1897–1910: 457), or that the addition was made by analogy with 1 Cor. 4:4 (Gnilka 1976: 198n75), or that it would compensate for the lack of a direct object (Hawthorne). One is also unimpressed by the argument that the addition “destroys the balance of the four-part structure of the sentence” (so Metzger 1994: 548). Given the Pauline emphasis on justification as something already experienced by the believer (Rom. 5:1; etc.), why would it occur to any scribe to introduce this apparently un-Pauline idea?

On the other hand, it is relatively easy to explain the omission of the clause if it is original; it was either omitted deliberately because of its apparent theological difficulty, or it was omitted accidentally because of the repetition of ἡ ἥδη (homoeoarcton). In favor of its originality, one should notice the resulting paronomasia with διώκω.^[25] If the clause is original, it would be an interesting example of a future-eschatological use of the verb (cf. Rom. 2:13), but the external evidence is so strongly in favor of the omission that the originality of the clause remains doubtful at best.

3:12. ἐφ’ ᾧ καὶ κατελήμφθην: The force of the καί is not easily reproduced. NIV does not try, while the “also” of NASB is rather unclear. Schenk (1984: 308) is probably correct that the adverb focuses on the past event as the basis for Paul’s hope. My paraphrase attempts to represent this general idea with the addition of “already.”

3:13. οὐ: The textual tradition is deeply divided between this reading and οὐπω. The decision is immaterial, since the context injects the nuance “not yet” to the simple οὐ. This very point suggests that the original was indeed οὐ and that scribes semi-consciously altered it in accordance with the context. Perhaps we see this process in operation in Chrysostom’s homilies. The lemma says οὐ but the commentary repeatedly says οὐδέπω, even when he appears to be quoting directly (Εἰ δὲ λέγει. . . . Οὐδέπω λογίζομαι κατελημφθῆναι . . .). The usual analysis of this kind of discrepancy—that the commentary gives us Chrysostom’s text but that the lemma has been altered by later copyists—is probably wrong in this particular case.

3:14. κατὰ σκοπόν: Since the related verb σκοπέω is used in verse 17 (it had earlier been used in 2:4), and since it appears to have a semantic connection with φρονέω (note vv. 15–16 and see the introduction, “Distinctive Teaching”), it is possible that Paul intends a wordplay here. My paraphrase (“on which I have set my eyes”) is an awkward attempt to alert the reader to this possible connection. Cf. Schenk 1984: 258.

3:15. ἑτέρως: This adverbial form occurs only here in the NT and only once in Epictetus (Disc. 2.16.16 [LCL 1:327]): ἂν δ’ ἑτέρως χωρήσῃ (but if the plan goes the other way; that is, if it fails). A strong negative nuance is also present in Josephus (Ag. Ap. 1.5 §26 [LCL, p. 173]), in the course of his criticizing undependable historians: “each of these writers, in giving his divergent account of the same incidents [εἰ ταῦτὰ γράψειαν ἑτέρως], hoped thereby to be thought the most veracious of all.” LSJ 702 (meaning V.3) has a specific acceptation (“otherwise than should be, badly, wrongly”) under which Phil. 3:15 is included; hence my paraphrase above, “if you have the wrong frame of mind.”

3:16. ἐφθάσαμεν: According to Schenk (1984: 309), this verb is equivalent to κατελήμφθην in verse 12.

3:16. τῷ αὐτῷ στοιχεῖν: This is the preferred critical reading; it is both shorter and more difficult, and thus it accounts for the Majority reading, which adds the words κανόνι, τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν (with some variations in the textual tradition). If the longer reading (in any of its forms) were regarded as original, there would be no reasonable explanation for the origin of the shorter reading (cf. Metzger 1994: 548–49).

3:17. συμμιμηταί μου γίνεσθε: Some writers place considerable emphasis on the preposition συμ- (i.e., συν), either by suggesting that Paul means, “become imitators [of Christ] with me,” or by seeing here one more reference to the need for agreement in the community, “Imitate me, one and all of you together!” (so Hawthorne; cf. NEB). The other approach is to see no significance in the preposition (cf. GNB). The ambiguous NASB rendering, “join in following my example,” is a felicitous compromise. Though we should resist placing undue emphasis on compounded forms, it seems plausible that the verb reflects Paul’s concern with unity (thus my paraphrase). The best alternative is Meyer’s view (appealing to Theophylact) that the context requires a connection between the verb and those who were already imitating Paul (subsequent clause). This position seems to be reflected in the NIV, “Join with others in following my example.” If so, the second part of the verse may be viewed as a restatement of the first part.

3:17. καθὼς ἔχετε τύπον ἡμᾶς (lit., even as you have us for a model): The καθὼς is probably not correlative to the preceding οὕτω but has an “argumentative” (Meyer) or even mildly causal function (as in 1:7; cf. BDAG 494, s.v. καθὼς, meaning 3). The ἡμᾶς may be deliberately vague, but I can see no persuasive reason to deny that the reference is to Paul (contra Meyer).

3:18. πολλοί: One should not deduce that a large number is meant. The word probably has a rhetorical force (cf. Schenk 1984: 284).

3:18. γάρ: Strictly speaking, this verse does not state the reason for the command of verse 17 but rather for the (unstated) fact that such a command is necessary (note my paraphrase).

3:18. περιπατοῦσιν: As Lightfoot points out, one expects after this verb a qualifying adverb or phrase. Instead, the syntax is interrupted, a relative clause is introduced (“of whom I often told you”), the relative clause itself is syntactically “unfinished” (one expects it to be followed by ὅτι), the qualifying idea is then expressed by a noun phrase awkwardly attached to the relative clause (τοὺς ἐχθρούς . . .), and a description of the heretics’ “walk” finally appears in verse 19 in the form of two more relative clauses plus an “abrupt nominative occurring without any grammatical connexions and expressing amazement” (Lightfoot). Not surprisingly, the scribe of P⁴⁶ attempted to touch up the syntax by inserting βλέπετε (in analogy with v. 2) before τοὺς ἐχθρούς, with the resulting meaning: “. . . of whom I often told you, and now tell you even weeping, ‘Beware of the enemies of the cross of Christ.’”

3:19. τέλος: My paraphrase tries to reflect Paul’s possible wordplay with τέλειοι in verse 15 (cf. Schenk 1984: 286).

3:19. καὶ ἡ δόξα ἐν τῇ αἰσχύνῃ αὐτῶν (lit., and the glory in their shame): The standard interpretation of the syntax is to take ἡ δόξα as the subject of its own clause, with ἐστὶν understood: “and [whose] glory is in their shame.” Hawthorne objects to this analysis on the grounds that the καί links ἡ δόξα with the preceding ἡ κοιλία as a single subject. His own rendering is: “Their observance of food laws and their glorying in circumcision has become their god.” (Hawthorne believes that non-Christian Jews are the opponents attacked throughout the chapter.) This rendering seems to me artificial and possibly even solecistic.

3:20. ἡμῶν: There is no denying the emphatic force of placing the pronoun first in the sentence, and several commentators have helpfully pointed out the parallel in 3:3. This formal parallel is insufficient evidence, however, for Lincoln’s (1981: 97) view that the term πολίτευμα had been used by Jewish Christians as part of their propaganda and that here in verse 20 Paul takes it over as a catchword.^[26]

3:20. ἐξ οὗ: This singular relative pronoun agrees grammatically with πολίτευμα, a fact that appears to support the understanding of the noun as a concrete place (e.g., “homeland”). There can be no strong objection to seeing the plural οὐρανοῖς as the real antecedent; such ad sensum constructions are very common.^[27] The understanding of πολίτευμα as “state” or “commonwealth” seems in any case appropriate, since it preserves, but does not emphasize, the spatial element.

3:21. σύμμορφον: The Majority text reading is εἰς τὸ γενέσθαι αὐτὸ σύμμορφον (in order that it might become conformed). This is a fairly obvious attempt to improve the terse syntax. The earliest Greek evidence for this reading is a seventh-century correction of D.

3:21. κατὰ τὴν ἐνέργειαν τοῦ δύνασθαι αὐτόν: Cf. BDF §400.2: “Certain passages exhibit a very loose relationship between the substantive and infinitive and tend toward the consecutive sense” (“the power so that he can”).

4:1. ἀγαπητοί . . . ἀγαπητοί: The second occurrence, no doubt perceived to be redundant, was omitted by a few (mostly “Western”) witnesses. The opposite tendency—toward uniformity—led to the addition of a second μου. These variants are very instructive for our assessment of both the Pauline style and scribal activity.

- I. Opening (1:1–11)
- II. Paul’s Missionary Report (1:12–26)
- III. A Call to Sanctification (1:27–2:30)
- IV. Doctrinal Polemics (3:1–4:1)
- V. Final Concerns (4:2–23)

V. Final Concerns (4:2–23)

The exhortations that begin in verse 2 may signal that Paul has concluded the body of the letter and begun the paraenesis (hortatory section). This structural pattern appears most clearly in Rom. 12:1 and Gal. 5:1 (or 5:2) and is reflected elsewhere (e.g., Col. 3:1; 1 Thess. 4:1). One also finds considerable variety, however. In the case of 1 Corinthians, one could argue that the hortatory section (1 Cor. 5:1–16:12?) is longer than the “body” of the letter (cf. Roetzel 1975: 24, 28), while 2 Corinthians appears to be missing such a section altogether. Moreover, it may be a mistake to draw too sharp a distinction between body and paraenesis.

Philippians is somewhat anomalous in at least two respects. Verses 2–3 of chapter 4, though undoubtedly hortatory, show a strong structural link with the body.^[1] Further, verses 10–20 seem out of place, a factor that has led many scholars, without sufficient warrant, to view that section as part of a different letter. As we shall see, it is not all that difficult to account for the position of verses 10–20. The former question—whether verses 2–3 should be viewed as the end of the body or the beginning of the paraenesis—is less easily answered. As pointed out earlier, it may well be that 3:20–4:3 forms an inclusio with 1:27. Without necessarily denying that possibility, however, we should fully appreciate the transitional character of 4:1. And because it seems a little artificial to separate the exhortation of verses 2–3 from those that follow, we are well advised to view 4:2–23 as the concluding section of the letter, consisting of paraenesis (vv. 2–9), a word of thanks (vv. 10–20), and the closing (vv. 21–23).

V. Final Concerns (4:2–23)

➤ A. Exhortations (4:2–9)

B. A Word of Thanks (4:10–20)

C. Closing (4:21–23)

A. Exhortations (4:2–9)

Paraenetic material in Paul's letters often occurs as a long string of loosely related commands; good examples are Rom. 12:9ff. and 1 Thess. 5:12ff. A comparably lengthy string is absent from Philippians, though 4:4–7 perhaps reflects this pattern. Another typical approach is to list a series of virtues and/or vices, as in Rom. 1:28–32; 5:3–5; 1 Cor. 6:9–11; Gal. 5:19–24; 1 Tim. 3:2–3; 2 Tim. 3:2–5; etc. (cf. 2 Pet. 1:5–7). This pattern is clearly found in Phil. 4:8. Thirdly, and more rarely, Paul might address instructions to specific individuals as he does here in verses 2–3 (the only other clear example is Col. 4:17).^[1] These three paraenetic patterns suggest a threefold outline of the unit:

1. Final call for unity (4:2–3)
2. Joy and anxiety (4:4–7)
3. Obedience and peace (4:8–9)

Exegesis and Exposition

²I beseech Euodia and I beseech Syntyche to adopt the same frame of mind by virtue of their union with the Lord. ³Moreover, I ask any of you loyal friends to be of assistance to them, for these women have struggled with me in the work of the gospel along with Clement and "with the rest of my coworkers"—[you may be sure that] their names are in the Book of Life.

⁴Rejoice in the Lord always. [I may appear repetitious, but] I will say it once more: rejoice. ⁵Your gentleness should be apparent to everyone. [After all, remember that the coming of] the Lord is near. ⁶So let nothing worry you. Instead, in every circumstance, by prayer and entreaty, let God know, along with your [reasons for] thanksgiving, what your requests are. ⁷And by virtue of your union with Christ Jesus, God's peace, which surpasses all understanding, will stand guard over your hearts and your "thoughts".

⁸Finally, brothers, keep your minds on that which is true, honorable, righteous, pure, lovely, respectable—yes, on any virtue and anything "worthy of praise". ⁹Put to practice the things that you have both learned and accepted, both heard and seen exemplified in me. And the God of peace [himself] will be with you.

1. Final Call for Unity (4:2–3)

Paul's repeated appeals for unanimity among the Philippians do not quite prepare us for his direct words in these verses. The only real parallel to this personal exhortation (apart from the Pastorals and Philemon) is Col. 4:17, where Archippus is encouraged to fulfill his ministry; the blepete (take heed, see to it) that introduces that exhortation suggests an indirect criticism. Here in Phil. 4:2–3, however, we have an express and unquestionable rebuke. It tells us a great deal about the seriousness of the Philippian problem that Paul should find it necessary to take such a step. At the same time, the apostle's directness confirms how close he felt to this church; one does not take risks of this sort unless one can depend on thick cushions of love and trust to absorb the impact of a rebuke.

Moreover, it is to the great credit of the Philippian community, and of Euodia and Syntyche in particular, that Paul considered them mature enough to be able to handle this unusual admonition. This point is worth emphasizing, because many readers tend to view Euodia and Syntyche in a negative light—troublemakers in an otherwise model church. Most likely, however, what we have here is not a personal quarrel between cantankerous old ladies, but rather a substantive division within the church leadership, which from the very beginning consisted largely of faithful women.^[2] The evidence is too vague to help us specify the nature of their leadership (even the suggestion that they were deaconesses cannot be proved), but one must not minimize the force of Paul's description of those two women as "coworkers" (συνεργῶν, synergōn; but see the second additional note on 4:3) who shared in the apostolic struggle (συνήθλησαν, synēthlēsan; see on 1:27, 30). They were surely mainstays of the believing Philippian community (cf. Chrysostom: "These women seem to me to be the chief of the Church which was there").

A very interesting question is raised by the explicit mention of Clement, an individual otherwise unknown to us. Lightfoot (who believed that the "true yokefellow" was a reference to Epaphroditus as bearer of the letter) interpreted the clause in question as follows: "I invite Clement also, with the rest of my fellow-labourers . . . to aid in this work of reconciliation." Hawthorne correctly argues that the clause should rather be construed with the verb synēthlēsan (“Clement too struggled with me”), but one still wonders why Clement should be mentioned by name. It may be simply that by linking Euodia and Syntyche with a prominent leader in the community, Paul strengthens his appeal: “These are worthy women who deserve your help.” Is it possible that Clement himself was somehow involved, though perhaps less directly, in the controversy? Earlier (see comments on 2:14) I considered the possibility that some of the Philippians may have been guilty of grumbling against their leaders. If so, the present commendation of Clement can be naturally understood as Paul’s desire to reinforce his exhortation that the leaders of the church be held in high regard (cf. 2:29).

Special attention should be paid to Paul’s instruction (though in the form of a request: ἐρωτῶ, erōtō, I ask) that others in the church become involved in the attempt to heal the division between Euodia and Syntyche. Who the γνήσιε σύζυγε (gnēsie syzyge, noble yokefellow) was has been the source of great speculation. Was it Epaphroditus (Lightfoot)? A man actually named Syzygos (O’Brien 1991: 480–81)? Paul’s wife (Clement of Alexandria, Strom. 3.6.53)? Many other speculative proposals have been made (Fee 1995: 394–95 argues for Luke), none of which can be proved or disproved. On the basis of our limited information, the most reasonable interpretation is that the appellative is in effect Paul’s way of inviting the various members of the church to prove themselves loyal partners in the work of the gospel. (On Paul’s use of the second person singular to address the recipients of the letter, cf. Rom. 2:1, 17; 8:2 [v.l.]; 9:20; 11:17ff.; 1 Cor. 14:17; 15:36; Gal. 6:1. Most of these instances, however, are negative in tone.)

The striking emphasis of this letter on corporate responsibility reaches a dramatic high point in the exhortation of verse 3. The discord between Euodia and Syntyche cannot be viewed by the congregation as a personal matter. These courageous women, whose names too were written in the Book of Life (cf. Exod. 32:32–33; Ps. 69:28; Dan. 12:1), needed the assistance of the whole church to resolve their differences; brothers and sisters must not avoid intervening in the dispute simply because they are afraid of “meddling.” Though Paul in this letter does not use the figure of the body with reference to the church (Rom. 12:4–5; 1 Cor. 12:12ff.; Eph. 4:15–16; Col. 2:18–19), one would be hard-pressed to find a more striking illustration of that principle than the request of Phil. 4:3.

2. Joy and Anxiety (4:4–7)

As already noted, these verses reflect a form of exhortation found near the end of some of Paul's letters, where loosely related injunctions are strung together. Having noted that feature, however, one realizes that the comparison is somewhat superficial, for here in Philippians the apostle lists only three instructions: rejoice, be gentle, and relieve your anxiety through prayer. Moreover, the first imperative stands in a class of its own, partly because joy has been a recurring theme of the letter, and partly because the command to rejoice at this point is almost a farewell (cf. Lightfoot, Hawthorne).

Most important is that the exhortations in this section are not as loosely related as may appear at first blush. Joy, a forbearing spirit, and inward peace are qualities that very much belong together, particularly in the context of the problems faced by the Philippian community. The threat posed by their opponents (1:28; 3:2, 18), their solicitous concern for the apostle in prison (1:18, 19; 4:10), the trauma created by selfishness within the church—these and other problems called for pastoral guidance and exhortation of the very kind exemplified in this passage.

Neither Paul's difficult circumstances nor the frightening dangers faced by the Philippians can be allowed to eclipse Christian joy as the mark of faith. Clearly Paul does not have in view the kind of superficial happiness that manifests itself only when things go well. No, it is a rejoicing that can be had πάντοτε (pantote, always), because it depends not on changing circumstances but on the one who does not change: "Rejoice in the Lord." And, in a manner reminiscent of 1:18, Paul repeats the command with reference to the future: "again I will say, rejoice!" It is as though the apostle anticipated some natural objections—"How can we possibly rejoice given our circumstances?"—and sensed the need to reiterate the command.

The exhortation that follows in verse 5 may be viewed as reinforcing Paul's call for believers to rejoice. Genuine Christian joy is not inward-looking. It is not by concentrating on our need for happiness, but on the needs of others, that we learn to rejoice. And so the apostle calls the Philippians once again to look out, not for their own interests, but "for the interests of others," and so to regard others as "more important" than themselves. That is the language Paul used in 2:3–4. Here in 4:5 he says, "Let your forbearing spirit [ἐπιεικής, epieikes] be known to all men" (cf.

NASB; BDAG 371, s.v. ἐπιεικής). Several commentators have suggested that the word reflects an attitude of contentment with one's state, even when one has not been treated justly. Although it would be difficult to prove that this nuance is a basic semantic component of the word, the context of the letter as a whole supports it. In other words, Paul expects believers to be guided by a frame of mind that does not put priority on personal rights. Believers whose primary concern is whether or not they are being dealt with fairly will fail to exercise a fundamental element of Christian behavior: preferring others above themselves.

The thrust of this command is then essentially the same as that of 2:3–4. And just as in chapter 2 Paul followed up his exhortation with an appeal to the humility of Christ, before whom we will all bow at the parousia (2:5–11), so here in 4:5 Paul reinforces his command with the simple but powerful comment ὁ κύριος ἐγγύς (ho kyrios engys, the Lord is near). It may well be that the apostle wants to remind us of the one who personifies the grace of epieikeia,^[3] and that his approaching return should awaken us to follow his example (see also additional note on 4:5). As Lightfoot paraphrases, “To what purpose is this rivalry, this self-assertion? The end is nigh, when you will have to resign all. Bear with others now, that God may bear with you then.”

The appeal to our Lord's return also becomes the basis for the third exhortation (vv. 6–7), which is expressed more fully than the other two: it includes a prohibition (“let nothing worry you”), a command (“tell God what your requests are”), specific instructions for the proper fulfillment of the command (“in everything—by prayer and entreaty—with thanksgiving”), and a comforting promise (v. 7). Paul uses four different words in reference to prayer: προσευχή (proseuchē, prayer), δέησις (deēsis, prayer, petition), εὐχαριστία (eucharistia, thanksgiving), and αἷτημα (aitēma, petition, request). This variety does not indicate an attempt to identify four discrete types of, or elements in, prayer. Apart from the occurrence of eucharistia—which certainly refers to the distinct aspect of thanksgiving and which appears to receive some emphasis (see the second additional note on 4:6)—the variation has a stylistic motive, reflected also in the triplet νοῦς, καρδία, νόημα (nous, kardia, noēma, mind, heart, thought) and in the fourfold repetition of πᾶς (pas, all; in the forms pantote [v. 4], pasin [v. 5], panti [v. 6], panta [v. 7]).

The real significance of this stylistic richness is not what it says about the theological components of prayer (or the psychological makeup of human beings) but rather about the great importance that Paul attaches to the believer's prayer life. The opposite of anxiety—indeed its relief—is the peace that only God, in answer to prayer, bestows upon his people. It is worthwhile noting that our Lord's instructions not to worry (mē merimnate tē psychē, Matt. 6:25 and Luke 12:22) are grounded in the assurance that God knows our needs (Matt. 6:32; Luke 12:30), and this very fact provides the theological underpinnings for effective prayer (Matt. 6:7–8; cf. in the broader context 7:7–11 and Luke 11:9–13). That the apostle is here reflecting, or even directly alluding to, Jesus's teaching seems very likely indeed.

Paul characterizes God's peace with the words ἡ ὑπερέχουσα πάντα νοῦν (hē hyperechousa panta noun). What is the force of this description? Very common is the view that our verse parallels Eph. 3:20: God can do “beyond all things” (hyper panta) that “we ask or think” (aitoumetha ē nooumen). This understanding of Phil. 4:7 has been disputed by some important scholars. Meyer, for example, appeals to the context and argues that the point of reference (panta noun) is the attempt on our part to find relief through other logical reasons; thus Paul means that God's peace easily surpasses such reasons.^[4] This approach could perhaps be supported by appealing to the similar expression in 3:8 (dia to hyperechon tēs gnōseōs Christou Iēsou), where the idea is not so much that the knowledge of Jesus transcends our understanding but that it is of surpassing value.

On the other hand, it is not at all clear that the immediate context supports Meyer's view. What the context certainly indicates is that the Philippians had plenty of reasons to worry, a thought that is also reflected in the next section (see comments on 4:12, 19). Moreover, the broader situational context of the letter should be brought into consideration. God's peace transcends our intellectual powers precisely because believers experience it when it is unexpected, in circumstances that make it appear impossible: Paul suffering in prison, the Philippians threatened by quarrels within and by enemies without.

That the Christians in Philippi were suffering anxiety because of opposition from outsiders (1:27) is understandable. But are we justified in relating Paul's exhortation to the lack of unanimity among the Philippians themselves? Hawthorne believes that the Philippians' self-centeredness does not at all come into view here, but the command of verse 5, as we have seen, suggests otherwise. One is reminded of James 4:2: “You want something but don’t get it. You kill and covet, but you cannot have what you want. You quarrel and fight. You do not have, because you do not ask God” (NIV).

The recipients of James’s letter, no doubt, were experiencing problems far more severe than anything present in Philippi, but this obvious fact should not prevent us from noticing a common feature: the linking of anxiety (arising from lack of contentment), quarrels, and the failure to bring petition to God. That the Philippians, who knew something about poverty (2 Cor. 8:1–2), needed to learn a lesson about Christian contentment seems clear from Paul’s words in 4:11, 12, 19; and surely the lack of humility among some members of the congregation (2:3–4) must have been another symptom of the same disease.

Paul’s antidote is very clear: Let joy take the place of your discontent and anxiety. Look away from yourselves to the needs of your brothers, being willing to yield your rights and privileges for their sake. And as far as your needs are concerned, bring them all before God in an attitude of thankfulness for what he has already given you. If you do this, you will learn what true and unshakable contentment really is.

3. Obedience and Peace (4:8–9)

Although (as pointed out in the introduction to this section) Paul elsewhere exhorts believers by using lists of virtues and/or vices, the list here in 4:8 is distinctive in several respects. For one thing, it has a strong and effective rhetorical tone. Paul achieves this stylistic effect by the sixfold repetition of the relative pronoun ὅσα (hosa, whatever), followed by two conditional clauses, “if [there is] any virtue, if [there is] any praise.” These last two clauses are meant to reinforce the all-encompassing character of Paul’s exhortation, since no list could be complete (cf. also Gal. 5:21, kai ta homoia toutois, and things like these). It is also unusual for Paul to use the verb λογίζομαι (logizomai, think, consider) with reference to a list of virtues; one might have expected to see here once again the verb phroneō (as in Rom. 8:5; Col. 3:2).

More important is the substance of this list, since it contains five terms that are not particularly common in the Pauline letters: σεμνός (semnos, honorable, noble; occurs in the Pastorals); ἁγνός (hagnos, pure; 2 Cor. 7:11; 11:2; also in the Pastorals); προσφιλής (prospilēs, lovely, winsome; nowhere else in the NT); εὐφημος (euphēmos, of good repute; also a NT hapax legomenon, though the noun euphēmia occurs in 2 Cor. 6:8); ἀρετή (aretē, excellence, virtue; nowhere else in Paul). Moreover, the term ἔπαινος (epainos, praise), though relatively common in Paul, occurs here in an unusual passive sense (“worthy of praise”), and some writers infer that it reflects the Greek ethical use of the word with reference to the society’s approval of human conduct.[5]

On the basis of these data and the fact that moral philosophers sometimes used similar lists of virtues, Hawthorne (following other scholars) argues that Paul is here appealing to the Philippians’ cultural background, that is, to their familiarity with current pagan morality: “You must not fail to live up to the ideals of your fellow men, which were also your ideals, before you were converted.”[6] It is of course true that Paul’s lists, like many other elements in his style, reflect the world in which he lived. Moreover, the note of citizenship characteristic of this letter (1:27; 3:21) may be thought to support some allusion to civic duty.

On the other hand, Paul’s very use of the citizenship motif is intended to draw the Philippians’ attention to their higher Christian allegiance, and that is surely the case here as well. The idea that at this point in the letter Paul descends from such heights and asks his brothers merely to act like well-behaved Greek citizens can hardly be taken seriously. Given the broad context of the epistle as a whole, the narrower context of 3:2–4:9 (see esp. Schenk 1984: 270), and the immediate context of verse 9 in particular, we must understand Paul’s list as representing distinctly Christian virtues (though we need not deny that many non-Christian citizens exemplify such virtues in their lives).

In verse 9 Paul intensifies the force of his exhortation in three ways. First, he changes his vocabulary: instead of repeating logizesthe (consider) or a comparable verb, he says πράσσετε (prassete, do, practice). Second, he emphasizes the sound instruction the Philippians have received with a fourfold reminder: “learned . . . received . . . heard . . . seen.” With such modeling before them (cf. also 1:30; 3:17) the Philippians have no excuse for improper behavior. Third, Paul ties this exhortation to his previous promise of peace (v. 7) with the words, “and the God of peace shall be with you.” It is not only the peace of God but the God of peace himself who will overshadow us with his care. Yet that promise is conditioned by the command to lead obedient lives. Whereas verses 6–7 call upon us to exercise faith through prayer, verses 8–9 draw us to a holy walk. And so the simple, even childlike, message of the familiar hymn captures quite accurately Paul’s words: “Trust and obey, for there’s no other way to be happy in Jesus, but to trust and obey.”

Additional Notes

4:2. παρακαλῶ . . . παρακαλῶ: This repetition of the verb is unusual. It strengthens the exhortation by addressing each woman individually. The use of παρακαλῶ rather than a harsher term (cf. ἐπιτάσσω, Philem. 8) is consonant with the tone already established in verse 1.

4:2. τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν: Most translations, such as “to live in harmony” (NASB) or “to agree with each other” (NIV), though defensible, obscure the connection between this verse and 2:2, where the same phrase occurs (alongside τὸ ἐν φρονοῦντες). The expression throws light on the contrasting passage, εἴ τι ἐτέρως φρονεῖτε (3:15); indeed, Schenk (1984: 271) views 4:2–3 as the concrete implementation and the elucidation of 3:15b.

4:3. Κλήμεντος: It is useless to speculate on the identity of this individual. Lightfoot (1868: 168–71) has probably said all that can be said about this matter.

4:3. καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν συνεργῶν μου (and the rest of my coworkers): The variant of Codex Sinaiticus, καὶ τῶν συνεργῶν μου καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν (and my coworkers, and the others), should not be quickly dismissed as “scribal inadvertence” (Metzger 1994: 549). The evidence of Ψ¹⁶, which unfortunately cannot be read with certainty, suggests that this was an early competing variant; it appears to reflect a different understanding of Paul’s words (i.e., that the women and Clement are not included under the category of “coworkers”).

4:5. ὁ κύριος ἐγγύς: Some interpreters (e.g., Chapple 1992) prefer to see in this comment a reference, not to the temporal nearness of the parousia, but to the “spatial” nearness of Jesus himself—his presence and availability. Others (e.g., Hawthorne) think Paul is being deliberately ambiguous. Similar language is indeed used in a spatial sense in the LXX, but nowhere clearly in the NT, where the emphasis is on the Lord’s direct presence rather than his nearness (but cf. James 4:8: “draw near to God and he will draw near to you”). Lightfoot properly appeals to the parallel in James 5:8, where believers are enjoined to show patience (μακροθυμήσατε) on the grounds of the approaching return of Christ (ὅτι ἡ παρουσία τοῦ κυρίου ἥγγικεν). This parallel, incidentally, would seem to support the view that ὁ κύριος ἐγγύς should be construed with what precedes, not with what follows (cf. Meyer, but note that he wrongly attributes this construction to Chrysostom). Quite possibly this is a false question, because what precedes (gentleness) and what follows (lack of anxiety) are themselves very closely connected. Vincent (following Alford 1871–75: 3.189; and Ellicott 1865: 91) believes that the clause links up with both, a plausible view that I have tried to preserve in the paraphrase.

4:6. τῇ προσευχῇ . . . τῇ δέήσει . . . τὰ αἰτήματα: As noticed earlier (see additional notes on 1:4), δέησις can be used either in a broad sense (equivalent to προσευχή) or with a narrower focus (equivalent to αἶτημα). The former is preferable here, which suggests that we should not look for any significant semantic distinction between προσευχή and δέησις in this context; the translation “prayer and petition” (used by several modern versions) effectively captures the slightly ambiguous sense of the Greek. Schenk (1984: 246) perhaps goes too far when he says that, in spite of the repetition of the article, these two nouns form a hendiadys here.

4:6. μετὰ εὐχαριστίας: This prepositional phrase is to be construed, not with what precedes (by prayer with thanksgiving), but with what follows (present your requests with thanksgiving; cf. Meyer). If so, notice that this phrase begins a new clause and occupies an emphatic position.

4:7. ἡ εἰρήνη: The old view that this word refers to brotherly harmony, though consonant with the thrust of the whole letter, is rightly rejected by Meyer because the form of Paul’s promise (“will guard your hearts”) does not at all suggest this idea.

4:7. τὰ νοήματα: Some “Western” witnesses read σώματα (bodies; \mathfrak{P}^{16} apparently conflates the two nouns, though the reading is doubtful). Lohmeyer raised the possibility that this variant is original and that it indicates in a unique way the holistic significance of martyrdom. If so, later scribes would have substituted the more general and colorless νοήματα. He admitted, however, that the evidence was insufficient. On the other hand, the variant should not be dismissed too quickly (regardless of one’s position on the role of martyrdom in this letter). Accounting for the change from νοήματα to σώματα is rather difficult.

4:8. ἔπαινος: The passive sense “worthy of praise” may have been unfamiliar to some scribes, for the “Western” textual tradition reads ἔπαινος ἐπιστήμης (praise of understanding), thus preserving the active sense of the word.

4:8. Should we attempt to differentiate among the terms in this list beyond the vague distinctions conveyed by the English renderings given in the exposition? Meyer is no doubt correct that the terms do not indicate different and individual virtues; rather, “each represents the Christian moral character generally, so that in reality the same thing is described, but according to the various aspects which commended it.” In short, all of these qualities could be subsumed under τὰ ἀγαθά.

4:9. ἃ καί: According to Schenk (1984: 270), this first occurrence of καί in the verse should be seen as an adversative. Such a construction (rather unclear in any case) cannot be correct. As a coordinating conjunction, the particle would have to be first in the sentence.

- V. Final Concerns (4:2–23)
 - A. Exhortations (4:2–9)
 - ▶ B. A Word of Thanks (4:10–20)
 - C. Closing (4:21–23)

B. A Word of Thanks (4:10–20)

This passage, though at first blush innocuous, has been the source of much controversy. To a number of scholars the passage seems out of place: Why would Paul wait until the end of the epistle to thank the Philippians? (The question becomes especially pressing if one of the major reasons for the writing of the letter was in fact to acknowledge receipt of the Philippians' gift.) This difficulty has led many fine scholars to view the passage as a separate brief letter, sent by Paul immediately after receiving the gift. The lack of any textual or historical evidence for this position, however, is a serious obstacle that can be removed only by the most persuasive kind of internal evidence. Such evidence is not forthcoming, and thus broad segments of scholarship have resisted this partitioning of the letter. As we shall presently see, there are plausible explanations for Paul's having decided to place these words at the end of the epistle.

A second difficulty is the tone of this passage. There is a certain hesitancy in Paul's expression; indeed, the way he qualifies his thanks (see esp. vv. 11, 17) has suggested to some scholars that he was not particularly enthusiastic about the gift. Perhaps we can best make this point by paraphrasing Paul's words as they might be misunderstood by someone unkindly disposed toward the apostle:

I am glad that at long last, after waiting all this time, you finally decided to think about me. Of course, I realize you were meaning to do it—you just could not get around to it. I hope you understand, however, that I do not really need the money. My circumstances do not bother me—I have learned to handle all kinds of situations. Nevertheless, it's a good thing you decided to send the money—I mean for your sake, of course, not mine. You are really the ones that profit by sending an offering.

This is of course a very unfair caricature (if only because of what it leaves out!), but it may assist us in understanding why modern readers are sometimes put off by Paul's remarks.[\[1\]](#)

The way to approach this problem is to become conscious of the distance (cultural and otherwise) that separates us from the apostle. The cultural difficulty is that all of us tend to identify gratefulness with a set of conventions that we are accustomed to. If we were to visit a foreign country where people do not say “Please” to introduce a request, we would be tempted to view them as rude (and it may take us a very long time to appreciate that, perhaps, the intonation of their voice conveys in their culture the very attitude we associate with “Please”). Just because we are not likely to express thanks the way Paul does it in this passage can hardly be sufficient grounds to conclude that he was ungrateful.

In addition to this cultural problem, we need to appreciate the tensions that Paul must have felt in his present circumstances. On the one hand, he was very much in need; even here he speaks of his affliction (v. 14). In at least some respects he must have had to depend on the churches. On the other hand, Paul had a strong sense of apostolic responsibility that prevented him from asking the churches to help even though he had the “right” to do so (see esp. 1 Cor. 9:1–18; 1 Thess. 2:9). Already once, when accepting help from the Philippians, he felt as though he had robbed them (2 Cor. 11:8–9; the term “Macedonians” must refer primarily, if not exclusively, to the church in Philippi), and now he is faced with the problem of acknowledging a truly sacrificial gift from a group of believers who were themselves in need.

Every minister has probably learned from experience how difficult it is to accept gifts graciously. How does one, without appearing ungrateful, discourage parishioners from spending their substance? Conversely, how does one give full, enthusiastic, and sincere thanks without suggesting that more is expected? Seen in this light, Paul’s words take on new meaning; in fact, one can hardly think of a more appreciative description of the Philippians’ gift than the powerful theological interpretation Paul gives to it in verse 18.

These considerations greatly minimize the problems that scholars have perceived in the placing of the passage at the end of the epistle. As already pointed out with reference to 1:5, Paul begins the letter with a clear and joyful reference to the Philippians’ gift. Any further comments regarding it, however, called for a sensitive handling that was best postponed until after other matters had been taken care of.

The way Paul alternates between appreciation and qualification makes it difficult to outline the passage. For practical purposes, I shall deal with these verses as follows:^[2]

1. Need and contentment (4:10–14)
2. A theology of Christian giving (4:15–20)

Exegesis and Exposition

¹⁰[Have I asked you to rejoice in the Lord? You should know that] I myself rejoice greatly in the Lord because at last you have been able to make your concern for me flourish again. To be sure, [I know full well that] you have had this concern all along—you simply had no opportunity to show it. ¹¹[Do not misunderstand my enthusiasm:] It is not out of a sense of deprivation that I speak, for I have learned to be content whatever my circumstances. ¹²I know how to deal with dearth and I know how to deal with abundance. I have been taught [to cope] with each and every situation: being full and hungry, experiencing plenty and shortage. ¹³I am strong enough for all these things through “the one” who empowers me. ¹⁴Of course, [that does not mean I do not appreciate your gift!] You have truly done well to share in my affliction.

¹⁵“But” [I am hardly surprised by your generosity:] you yourselves know, Philippians, that when the gospel first [came to you] and I left Macedonia, no church shared with me in matters of income and expenditure except you only. ¹⁶Why, even when I was still in Thessalonica, once and again you sent [provisions] “for my needs”. ¹⁷[If I commend you so much] it is not because I am interested in receiving [more] gifts; what I am interested in is the proceeds that will accrue to your account. ¹⁸Indeed, I have received all I need and more. I am fully taken care of now that I have received from Epaphroditus what you sent—a beautiful fragrance, an acceptable sacrifice, pleasing to God. ¹⁹[Who can doubt] then that my God “will fully take care of” all your needs [not merely according to what you consider necessary but] according to his riches in glory, [which become ours] in union with Christ Jesus! ²⁰Now to our God and Father belongs the glory forever and ever. Amen.

1. Need and Contentment (4:10–14)

The progression of thought in these verses can be viewed as follows:

1. commendation (v. 10a)
2. first qualification (v. 10b)
3. second qualification (vv. 11–13)
4. commendation restated (v. 14)

The restatement in verse 14 was made necessary by the very length of Paul's qualifications (which might leave the impression that his thanks were a mere formality). But why were the qualifications needed in the first place? In addition to the factors already treated above, we must note the specific focus of Paul's comments.

The second clause of verse 10 is introduced with the combination ἐφ' ᾧ (eph' hō). The literal translation "upon which" makes no sense, and this fact suggests that we are dealing with an idiomatic expression. Lightfoot, following in general the common interpretation in the nineteenth century, tried to preserve the literal meaning of the preposition by viewing "my wants" (a meaning implied in the clause τὸ ὑπὲρ ἑμοῦ φρονεῖν, to hyper emou phronein, your caring for me) as the antecedent of the pronoun hō. The resulting meaning would be: "at length you revived your interest in me—in which [concerns] you did indeed interest yourselves."^[3] The usual understanding nowadays is that the phrase has taken on a causal meaning ("for the reason that" → "for, because").^[4] Because the translation "for" in 4:10 remains ambiguous, however, it has become common to use the rendering "indeed" for the more inclusive phrase eph' hō kai.

This rendering is probably the best alternative, but scholars do not usually recognize (or point out) that it injects a slight concessional force into the phrase (cf. NEB: "for that matter"). This idea, first proposed by Luther (in his translation wiewohl, although), has been routinely dismissed in the standard commentaries. Yet there is some plausibility to Bligh's view (see comments on 3:12 above) that all four NT instances may be viewed as rhetorical corrections. At any rate, Luther's sense of contextual propriety led him to a defensible rendering, even though he might have been unable to provide broader linguistic support for it.

The reason for dwelling on the thrust of eph' hō is to emphasize the function of verse 10b as intended to correct any false impressions arising out of verse 10a. The words ἤδη ποτέ (ēdē pote, usually rendered "finally, at last") might suggest an indirect rebuke that the Philippians had shown no concern for an extended period. The answer to this difficulty is not to struggle over the precise force of ἀνεθάλετε (anethalete, you caused to grow, revived; see the second additional note on 4:10). We should rather focus, as already suggested, on the concessional or correcting force of the second part of the verse; in other words, Paul rejoices because the Philippians have finally had the opportunity to demonstrate their concern, and they have used that opportunity to the fullest.

It is the second qualification, however, that occupies Paul's attention in greater detail (vv. 11–13). The very warmth of his gratefulness ("I rejoiced greatly") might suggest that he had felt discontent over his needy condition. He must therefore make clear what is the nature of true Christian contentment. But why should he be so concerned about this? Was Paul afraid that the Philippians might view him as "unspiritual"? Quite the contrary, it was for the sake of the Philippians themselves that he must deal with this subject. We must keep in mind that this passage is flanked by a reference to the Philippians' anxiety over their needs (4:6–7) and by a promise that God will supply those needs (4:19). The Philippians needed to hear—and to see exemplified in the apostle—that the enjoyment of material abundance is not the basis for contentment.

In the course of his remarks Paul uses two terms that occur nowhere else in the NT. In verse 12 he says μεμύημαι (memyēmai, lit., I have been initiated). The verb myeō was normally used with reference to rituals of initiation into the mystery religions, and the question arises whether Paul is exploiting that meaning here. Most commentators think so, with several of them (including Lightfoot and Hawthorne) placing considerable emphasis on it. It is clear, however, that the word could be used in a nontechnical way (cf. TDNT 4:828), and one may argue that Paul uses the verb here merely as a colorful stylistic variant for ἔμαθον (emathōn, I learned, v. 11) and οἶδα (oida, I know, v. 12 twice).^[5] It would seem out of place for Paul to draw at this point a deliberate comparison with cultic initiations, though we must allow for the possibility that, given the associations of the word, Paul uses it with a touch of irony.

The other unexpected form is αὐτάρκης (autarkēs, v. 11), a term popular among Hellenistic philosophers to describe self-sufficiency and independence from external pressures. Here again we must distinguish between semitechnical meanings and more general usage. Paul is not concerned about his self-achievement. Although his use of this term may well reflect the broad influence of Stoicism on Greco-Roman society (otherwise clearly attested in the rest of the apostle's vocabulary), the general nuance of "contentment" is surely to be preferred in this context.^[6] Indeed, Paul makes perfectly clear in verse 13 what he means: his sense of contentment does not arise out of personal resources but comes from the one who strengthens him.

As was possibly the case with memyētai, however, the word may have been chosen deliberately to suggest and therefore counteract pagan notions. There is a sense in which Christians, precisely by recognizing their weaknesses, are able to manifest true self-sufficiency. Once again in this epistle we are perhaps being reminded of the great paradox: our dependence on God's power does not preclude our effort, and our working does not contradict the reality of grace (see comments on 2:12–13).

2. A Theology of Christian Giving (4:15–20)

As if to leave no doubt regarding his appreciation for their gift, the apostle reminds the Philippians of the unique service they have performed from the very beginning in contributing to his ministry. It is not clear whether this uniqueness lay in the fact that they were the only church willing to contribute or that Paul gave to them alone the privilege of sharing in this way. Lightfoot takes the latter alternative: “You yourselves will recollect that, though it was my rule not to receive such contributions, I made an exception in your case.” Even if Paul did make an exception, however, it seems unlikely that he would make a point of it in this context. Indeed, verse 16 very clearly emphasizes the Philippians' generous initiative—not the granting of apostolic privilege—when he was in need in Thessalonica.

[7]

Once again, however, Paul feared that his strong commendation may be interpreted as a request for more. Just as in verse 11 he had introduced an important qualification with the words οὐχ ὅτι, so in verse 17 he seeks to correct any false impressions: οὐχ ὅτι ἐπιζητῶ τὸ δόμα (ouch hoti epizētō to doma, Not that I seek the gift). This time the apostle does not dwell on the theme of true contentment. Instead, he gives a new and unexpected twist to the discussion by saying that what he is really after is τὸν καρπὸν τὸν πλεονάζοντα εἰς λόγον ὑμῶν (ton karpon ton pleonazonta eis logon hymōn, the fruit that increases to your account).

Note that the qualification in verses 11–13 had a negative thrust. There Paul explains that it was not personal contentment that accounted for his joyful outlook. On the other hand, verse 17 focuses on the positive side: the actual grounds for Paul's joy consists in what the gift demonstrates about the Philippians themselves. We find a comparable concern in chapter 9 of 2 Corinthians. There Paul in effect rebukes the Corinthians for their hesitancy in contributing to the offering for the poor in Jerusalem. He feared greatly that the church would end up giving out of a sense of compulsion; such an offering, inasmuch as it does not proceed from a cheerful heart, does not constitute a rich bounty (eulogia, v. 5), regardless of the size of the offering. Accordingly, verses 8–15 of that chapter emphasize, not what the contribution would mean for the Jerusalem church, but what it would mean for the Corinthians themselves.

Here in Philippians the apostle, as if to settle once for all that he is not requesting any further gifts (possibly implying that he will not accept them in the future?), underlines his present satisfaction by using three increasingly emphatic verbs in verse 18. The first verb is ἀπέχω (apecho), which could be translated in the general sense of “receive back, hold, keep” (cf. Philem. 15). Paul seems deliberately to exploit the commercial nuance associated with the verb. In this very passage he has already used the language of banking and business. For example, λόγον δόσεως καὶ λήμψεως (logon doseōs kai lēmpseōs, lit., matter of giving and receiving, v. 15) is recognized by most scholars as the accounting language of debits and credits. Similarly, ton karpon in verse 17 can plausibly reflect the idea of profit or even interest credited to an account (logon).

Would not the readers be expected to understand apechō along the same lines? Notice, moreover, that Paul does not use a past tense, as one might anticipate if a general meaning were in view (“everything arrived safely”). The combination apechō panta, therefore, could well be translated with an equivalent English business expression, such as “I am in receipt of all,” or even “Paid in full!” It would be a mistake, however, to infer that such language suggests coldness or aloofness. On the contrary, we may well imagine a warm Pauline smile as he dictated these words; Paul’s playfulness here is one more evidence of the closeness existing between him and the Philippians.

The next two verbs are περισσεύω (perisseuō, I abound) and πεπλήρωμαι (peplērōmai, I am amply supplied). It may be that both of these terms continue the business metaphor (cf. Danker 1972: 96, 100). On the other hand, the transition to a more explicitly theological interpretation of the Philippians’ gift is apparent here. The verb perisseuō in particular takes on a clear eschatological nuance for Paul: believers truly experience the abundance of the messianic age (see the second additional note on 1:9).

One must not think, of course, that prior to this point Paul has overlooked the theological implications of the offering. The expression in verse 14, καλῶς ἐποιήσατε (kalōs epoiēsate, you have done well) recalls Gal. 6:9 (to kalon poiountes mē enkakōmen, let us not be weary in well-doing), a passage that also focuses on financial stewardship. Again, the phrase logon doseōs kai lēmpseōs in verse 15, though it may indeed suggest a banker's ledger, strongly reminds us of the language used by Paul in Rom. 15:27, where Christian Gentiles are represented as debtors (opheilētai) to the Jews for their spiritual heritage, and where moreover the Gentiles' offering is described with the verb leitourgeō (cf. Phil. 2:30).

Lightfoot and Hawthorne object to this perspective on the grounds that it destroys the business metaphor. The concern is justified, but Paul hardly expects anyone to press his figurative language.^[8] Chrysostom and a long line of interpreters (including Martin 1976: 175–76, who also appeals to 1 Cor. 9:11) are most likely right in seeing here an allusion to the Pauline principle of material remuneration for spiritual blessing (cf. also Gal. 6:6). Even the phrase in verse 17, ton karpon ton pleonazonta eis logon hymōn, whether or not it reflects the language of banking, may allude to the theological principle that we will reap fruit that corresponds to what we have sown (a saying that appears also in the financial contexts of 2 Cor. 9:6; Gal. 6:8).

But even if one should insist on an exclusively business metaphor for verses 15 and 17–18a, the latter part of verse 18 is undoubtedly and directly theological. There Paul describes the gift as ὀσμὴν εὐωδίας, θυσίαν δεκτὴν, εὐάρεστον τῷ θεῷ (osmēn euōdias, thysian dektēn, euareston tō theō, lit., an aroma of fragrance, an acceptable sacrifice, well-pleasing to God). The use of such OT cultic terminology to describe Christian worship became common in the early church, in part no doubt because the OT itself recognizes that outward rituals should be but the manifestation of inward realities (this is certainly the meaning of the prophetic insistence that obedience “is better than sacrifice,” 1 Sam. 15:22; cf. Ps. 51:16–17; Isa. 1:11–20; Hos. 6:6). The notion that Christian praise corresponds quite precisely to the Jewish sacrifices is made explicit in Heb. 13:15–16, that is, by the NT writer who shows the greatest interest in formulating the relation between the old and new covenants.

What makes Paul's words doubly significant is that he uses virtually identical language in Eph. 5:2 to describe Christ's sacrifice: "an offering and a sacrifice to God for an aroma of fragrance" (προσφορὰν καὶ θυσίαν τῷ θεῷ εἰς ὁσμὴν εὐωδίας, prosphoran kai thysian tō theō eis osmēn euōdias).^[9] The uniqueness, and therefore inimitable character, of that self-sacrifice should not prevent us from recognizing that Jesus's humiliation—even to the point of death—does indeed provide a pattern for our behavior (cf. on Phil. 2:5–11). Similar language is also used by Paul in Rom. 12:1 with reference to sanctification more broadly conceived. It is important to note again (cf. comments on 1:5–6 above) that contributing out of our material resources is not any less "spiritual" an activity than other aspects of the Christian experience. Indeed, it is an integral factor in the believer's sanctification.

Paul concludes by assuring the Philippians that God's own resources, "his riches in glory" (τὸ πλοῦτος αὐτοῦ ἐν δόξῃ, to ploutos autou en doxē, v. 19), are more than adequate to meet their needs (πληρώσει πᾶσαν χρείαν, plērōsei pasan chreian). Hawthorne is correct in pointing to Paul's use of two terms found earlier in the passage (plērōō, v. 18; chreia, v. 16) and in insisting that verse 19 must refer to material needs. But is he correct to add that "material, physical needs are exclusively under discussion here" (emphasis added)? Should we view material and spiritual resources as mutually exclusive categories? While Paul does not ignore the realities of physical discomfort and suffering, his main concern is to help the Philippians find their true contentment in the peace and power of God (4:6–7, 11–13).

These considerations minimize the problem whether the original reading is the indicative plērōsei (interpreted as though Paul were guaranteeing that the Philippians would never be in want) or the optative plērōsai (indicating a wish; see the additional note on 4:19). Whether a prayer or a statement of fact, the words are intended to encourage the community with the assurance that God can and does provide all that believers need to enjoy true contentment. How significant Paul considered this truth to be is underlined by the doxology of verse 20.

Additional Notes

4:10. ἔχαρη: Hawthorne labels this verb an epistolary aorist, but that makes little sense. Surely this is a genuine past tense referring back to Epaphroditus's arrival with the gift, not a present tense viewed from the perspective of the recipients. Without leaning on the etymological connection between χαίρω and εὐχαριστέω, we should recognize that this expression of joy certainly communicates thankfulness.

4:10. ἀνεθάλετε: This verb should probably be taken in a transitive sense, with τὸ ὑπὲρ ἑμοῦ φρονεῖν as its object: “you revived your care for me.” Meyer, on the grounds that this resulting meaning would reflect insensitivity on Paul’s part, prefers to take the verb intransitively (with τὸ ὑπὲρ ἑμοῦ φρονεῖν as an accusative of reference) and argues that it points to a financial resurgence experienced by the Philippians. Such a move is both unlikely and unnecessary.

4:10. φρονεῖν . . . ἐφρονεῖτε: It is impossible in an English translation to convey the clear meaning of this verse and at the same time to draw the connection with other occurrences of φρονέω in this epistle. But the connection is surely there. And it may be doubly significant that Paul, after assuring the Philippians that he had the right frame of mind toward them (1:7), and then rebuking them for not having the right frame of mind toward one another (2:2, 5; 3:15; 4:2), here at the end encourages them by recognizing a very positive trait in their attitude.

4:12. μεμύημα: Some translations (cf. NASB; NIV) attempt to preserve the nuance discussed above with the rendering “I have learned the secret.” English readers unfamiliar with the mystery religions, however, probably attach to this phrase a quite different nuance from that intended by Paul (if indeed he had a double meaning in view at all).

4:13. τῷ ἐνδυναμοῦντί με: The Majority text, reflected in KJV, adds Χριστῷ at the end of this clause. Although this reading has some early support, the omission has much wider and stronger attestation. Of course, the meaning is the same with either reading.

4:14. συγκοινωνήσαντες: On the significance of this verb as reflecting financial support, see the exegesis of 1:5.

4:15. δέ: The omission of this particle in \mathfrak{P}^{46} and D*, if not accidental, may suggest that scribes viewed this sentence as the beginning of a new thought. Almost any division of the passage appears a little artificial.

4:16. ὅτι: With Meyer, it is best to interpret this conjunction as argumentative in character (cf. my paraphrase).

4:16. εἰς: The omission of this preposition in some important witnesses must certainly have been caused by the identical ending of the previous word, δῖς.

4:17. οὐχ ὅτι ἐπιζητῶ τὸ δόμα: My paraphrase above reflects a particular understanding of the whole passage, namely, that Paul wished to discourage the Philippians from sending more gifts. This meaning is of course not inherent in the clause by itself; and as Meyer points out, the presence of the article speaks against it. On the other hand, there is no good reason to deny that such a concern may have motivated Paul.

4:19. πληρώσει: The main “Western” manuscripts, with the strong support of such minuscules as 33 and 1739, read the aorist optative, πληρώσαι, “May my God fill all your need.” One can think of no persuasive motive that would lead scribes to change the verb in either direction. The variation probably arose accidentally. At any rate, the value of the Alexandrian tradition, especially because it is supported here by the Majority text, makes the indicative the preferable reading. As pointed out in the exposition, however, the note of assurance is not really diminished if the optative is original.

- V. Final Concerns (4:2–23)
 - A. Exhortations (4:2–9)
 - B. A Word of Thanks (4:10–20)
 - C. Closing (4:21–23)

C. Closing (4:21–23)

The final greetings in this letter conform very closely to the standardized closings in Paul's letters. Only two matters will require comment.

Exegesis and Exposition

²¹Greet every saint in [the name of] Christ Jesus. The brothers who are with me greet you too. ²²I also send you greetings from the whole sanctified community, in particular those who belong to Caesar's household. ²³May the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your "spirit".

The mention of οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας (hoi ek tēs Kaisaros oikias, those of the house of Caesar; possibly a reference to the slaves) is unique in Paul, and it has played a part in the debate regarding the place from which Paul wrote Philippians. Little of significance has been said beyond Lightfoot's (1868: 171–78) careful discussion. It is now acknowledged on all sides that this reference, by itself, cannot have a decisive role in solving the problem. In conjunction with other data, I would still want to argue that its occurrence here strengthens the case for a Roman imprisonment as the background to the letter.

The other matter involves Paul's benediction in verse 23. With very minor variations, such a benediction occurs in all of Paul's letters (the most distinctive ones are found in 2 Corinthians and Ephesians). One peculiarity here is the reference to the spirit of the Philippians (μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματος ὑμῶν, meta tou pneumatōs hymōn). The same expression is found in only one other letter written by Paul to his churches, namely, Galatians (but cf. 2 Timothy and Philemon). Although there are some correspondences between these two epistles, the differences are much more significant. It is thus probably misleading to look for any points of contact that might account for this common feature. Apart from the added forcefulness of the word pneuma, it seems unlikely that this phrase is substantively different from the simpler expression, meth' hymōn.

Additional Note

4:23. τοῦ πνεύματος: The textual tradition decisively supports this reading. The alternate πάντων is no doubt the result of assimilation to the closings of Romans, 2 Corinthians, and 2 Thessalonians (cf. also 1 Corinthians and Ephesians). What is not so clear is why a comparable scribal change is not attested for Gal. 6:18.

Excursus

Scribal Tendencies in the Pauline Epistles

The proper use of transcriptional probability assumes that we have reliable data on the kinds of variations introduced by scribes. Scholars' assessments (encapsulated in the classic canons of criticism), though correct as far as they go, are much too general to inspire confidence when making difficult textual decisions. Detailed reports for specific manuscripts are few and far between, while reliable comparative data are virtually inaccessible.

With a view to minimizing that problem, the first edition of the present commentary included (as part of the introduction) the results of detailed collations of the text of Philippians in several manuscripts plus the Majority text. I subsequently expanded the investigation to include the text of Galatians; several additional manuscripts were also included in the collation. The results of this research were presented at the annual meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature in November of 1989, under the title "Scribal Tendencies in the Pauline Epistles: A Computer-Assisted Report." A summary of that material is presented here.

For the purposes of the investigation, the text of UBS⁴ (= NA²⁷) is treated as though it were the original. This is only a working hypothesis: by collating a series of manuscripts against that text, we can then ask whether such a text could reasonably account for the variations. Although the collation was exhaustive, the accompanying chart does not include orthographic variants. The category "function words" includes the definite article, conjunctions, prepositions, and other short words (such as particles and relative pronouns) that can easily drop out. In the case of compound verbs, if the variant has to do with the preposition, then it is classified as a function word, not a verb (e.g., ἐκδέχομαι for ἀπεκδέχομαι is treated as an omission of a function word). There is room for disagreement regarding the categories used here, as well as decisions in particular cases, but these differences would not affect the picture as a whole.

It can be argued that no aspect of text-critical work is more important than the proper evaluation of transcriptional probability. Unless we can give a reasonable explanation why the variant we reject arose in the first place, our choice of variants is indefensible. Now the familiar rules regarding scribal proclivities are only generalizations—valid generalizations, to be sure, but in need of qualifications of all kinds. When evaluating a particular variant, for example, it is accurate to say that scribes often omitted small words accidentally (for a defense of this canon, see Silva 1985). But that is not enough. In the case of Alexandrinus, the difference between adding and omitting function words is not significant; in the case of \mathfrak{P}^{46} , Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, and Codex 33 the difference is overwhelming, with all four of these important manuscripts being three times more likely to omit a function word than to add one. It is also important to note that the omission of a verb is so rare as to be an irrelevant consideration.

Being aware of specific manuscript profiles can be very useful in some particular instances. The combination $\mathfrak{P}^{46} \& B D \Psi$ 1739 is generally strong, but not to be trusted if the variant they support is the omission of a function word. In contrast, the combination A C 33 and Majority text is exceedingly weighty for that kind of variant (also for the omission of nominal forms). Manuscripts A D and the Majority text are weak witnesses if the addition of a noun is the variant in question, while $\mathfrak{P}^{46} B$ 1739 (but not necessarily $\&$) are weighty. If the variant we are dealing with is of a grammatical sort, we need not pay much attention to $\mathfrak{P}^{46} D$ and Ψ . One should never trust D when dealing with a transposition.

The material has certain limitations. (1) The fact that UBS⁴ was used as the collating base no doubt skews the results, though my impression is that most of the significant percentages perhaps would not change substantially. (2) Because the collation is exhaustive and does not focus on singular readings (it even includes errors that were corrected by the first hand, since these too tell us something about scribal proclivities), the results do not accurately represent the errors introduced by the scribe responsible for a specific manuscript. On the other hand, the errors introduced by the scribe's predecessors contribute to the profile of the manuscript. (3) Most important, note that the material does not represent a scientifically reliable sample. Ideally, we should have data for the whole Pauline corpus. Some informal checking, however, suggests that, in general, the percentages reflect accurately what we would find throughout the corpus. But some specific inconsistencies are troublesome, especially with erratic manuscripts like \mathfrak{P}^{46} and D. For example, we find twenty-two omissions of function words in D for the book of Philippians. Since Galatians is significantly longer, one might anticipate finding more than thirty omissions there, but in fact there are only thirteen.

[illegible]

| | | | | | | | | | | |
|----------------------|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|----|
| Divine names | 2 | 2 | 3 | 4 | 0 | 2 | 2 | 4 | 4 | 3 |
| Other phrases | 3 | 5 | 3 | 4 | 2 | 25 | 13 | 6 | 9 | 16 |
| Total | 5 | 7 | 6 | 8 | 2 | 27 | 15 | 10 | 13 | 19 |
| | | | | | | | | | | |
| Grammatical | | | | | | | | | | |
| Function words | 2 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 5 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 0 |
| Nouns/pronouns | 15 | 5 | 3 | 5 | 6 | 12 | 15 | 10 | 5 | 10 |
| Verbs | 25 | 14 | 13 | 10 | 13 | 23 | 23 | 14 | 16 | 14 |
| Total | 42 | 19 | 16 | 15 | 19 | 40 | 38 | 25 | 22 | 24 |
| | | | | | | | | | | |
| Miscellaneous | | | | | | | | | | |
| Function words | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Nouns/pronouns | 3 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 3 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 2 |
| Verbs | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Phrases | 6 | 2 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 4 | 2 | 0 | 2 | 1 |
| Total | 11 | 3 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 7 | 3 | 1 | 2 | 3 |

Works Cited

Aland, K. (ed.)

- 1978–83 Vollständige Konkordanz zum griechischen Neuen Testament. Berlin and New York: de Gruyter.

Aland, K., and B. Aland

- 1989 The Text of the New Testament: An Introduction to the Critical Editions and to the Theory and Practice of Modern Textual Criticism. Translated by E. F. Rhodes. 2nd edition. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

Alexander, L.

- 1989 “Hellenistic Letter-Forms and the Structure of Philippians.” Journal for the Study of the New Testament 37:87–101.

Alford, H.

- 1871–75 The Greek Testament. 7th edition. London: Rivingtons.

Aquinas, T.

- 1969 Commentary on Saint Paul’s First Letter to the Thessalonians and the Letter to the Philippians. Translated by F. R. Larcher and Michael Duffy. Aquinas Scripture Series 3. Albany, NY: Magi.

Attridge, H. W., and R. A. Oden (trans.)

- 1976 The Syrian Goddess = (De dea Syria), Attributed to Lucian. Society of Biblical Literature Texts and Translations 9. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press.

Aune, D. E. (ed.)

- 1988 Greco-Roman Literature and the New Testament: Selected Forms and Genres. Society of Biblical Literature Sources for Biblical Study 21. Atlanta: Scholars Press.

Bakirtzis, C., and H. Koester (eds.)

- 1998 Philippi at the Time of Paul and after His Death. Harrisburg, PA: Trinity.

Barker, K. L.

1982 “False Dichotomies between the Testaments.” Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 25:3–16.

Barth, G.

1979 Der Brief an die Philipper. Zürcher Bibelkommentare NT 9. Zürich: Theologischer Verlag.

Barth, K.

1962 The Epistle to the Philippians. Richmond: John Knox.

Bateman, H. W.

1998 “Were the Opponents at Philippi Necessarily Jewish?” Bibliotheca sacra 155:39–61.

Baumert, N.

1969 “Ist Philipper 4, 10 richtig übersetzt?” Biblische Zeitschrift 13:256–62.

Baur, F. C.

1875 Paul: His Life and Works. 2 vols. London: Williams & Norgate.

BDAG

A Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature. By W. Bauer, F. W. Danker, W. F. Arndt, and F. W. Gingrich. 3rd edition. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.

BDF

A Greek Grammar of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature. By F. Blass, A. Debrunner, and R. W. Funk. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961.

BDR

Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch. By F. Blass, A. Debrunner, and F. Rehkopf. 16th edition. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1984.

Beare, F. W.

1959 A Commentary on the Epistle to the Philippians. Harper's New Testament Commentaries. New York: Harper.

Bengel, J. A.

1855 Gnomon Novi Testamenti. 3rd edition. Tübingen: Ludov. Frid. Fues.

Best, E.

- 1968 "Bishops and Deacons: Philippians 1, 1." Studia evangelica 4:371–76.
- Betz, H. D.
- 1979 Galatians: A Commentary on Paul's Letter to the Churches in Galatia. Hermeneia. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Biblia Patristica Biblia Patristica: Index des citations et allusions bibliques dans la littérature patristique. Paris: Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, 1975–.
- Binder, H.
- 1987 "Erwägungen zu Phil 2.6–7b." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 78:230–43.
- Black, D. A.
- 1985 "Paul and Christian Unity: A Formal Analysis of Philippians 2:1–4." Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 28:299–308.
- 1988 "The Authorship of Philippians 2:6–11: Some Literary-Critical Observations." Criswell Theological Review 2:269–89.
- 1995 "The Discourse Structure of Philippians: A Study in Textlinguistics." Novum Testamentum 37:16–49.
- Bligh, J.
- 1966 Galatians in Greek: A Structural Analysis of St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, with Notes on the Greek. Detroit: University of Detroit Press.
- Bloomquist, L. G.
- 1993 The Function of Suffering in Philippians. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 78. Sheffield: JSOT Press.
- Bockmuehl, M.
- 1995 "A Commentator's Approach to the 'Effective History' of Philippians." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 60:57–88.
- 1997 "'The Form of God' (Phil. 2:6): Variations on a Theme of Jewish Mysticism." Journal of Theological Studies 48:1– 23.

- 1998 The Epistle to the Philippians. Black's New Testament Commentaries 11. London: Black/Peabody, MA: Hendrickson.

Bonnard, P.

- 1950 L'épître de saint Paul aux Philippiens. Commentaire du Nouveau Testament 10. Neuchâtel: Delachaux & Niestlé.

Boor, W. de

- 1962 Die Briefe des Paulus an die Philipper und an die Kolosser erklärt. 2nd edition. Wuppertaler Studienbibel. Wuppertal: Brockhaus.

Bormann, L.

- 1995 Philippi: Stadt und Christengemeinde zur Zeit des Paulus. Novum Testamentum Supplements 78. Leiden: Brill.

Böttger, P. C.

- 1969 "Die eschatologische Existenz der Christen: Erwägungen zu Phil 3, 20." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 60:244–63.

Branson, M. L., and C. R. Padilla (eds.)

- 1986 Conflict and Context: Hermeneutics in the Americas. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

Brewer, R.

- 1954 "The Meaning of Politeuesthe in Phil. 1:27." Journal of Biblical Literature 73:76–83.

Bruce, F. F.

- 1971 1 and 2 Corinthians. New Century Bible. Greenwood, SC: Attic.
- 1977 Paul: Apostle of the Heart Set Free. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- 1982 1 & 2 Thessalonians. Word Biblical Commentary 45. Waco, TX: Word.
- 1983 Philippians. Good News Commentary. San Francisco: Harper & Row.

Brucker, R.

- 1997 ‘Christushymnen’ oder ‘epideiktische Passagen’? Studien zum Stilwechsel im Neuen Testament und seiner Umwelt. Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments 176. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- Bruggen, J. van
- 1981 Die geschichtliche Einordnung der Pastoralbriefe. Wuppertal: Brockhaus.
- Buchanan, C. O.
- 1964 “Epaphroditus’ Sickness and the Letter to the Philippians.” Evangelical Quarterly 36:157–66.
- Caird, G. B.
- 1976 Paul’s Letters from Prison: Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, in the Revised Standard Version. New Clarendon Bible. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Calvin, J.
- 1965 The Epistles of Paul the Apostle to the Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians. Translated by T. H. L. Parker. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Capper, B. J.
- 1993 “Paul’s Dispute with Philippi: Understanding Paul’s Argument in Phil 1–2 from His Thanks in 4.10–20.” Theologische Zeitschrift 49:193–214.
- Carmignac, J.
- 1971–72 “L’importance de la place d’une negation: Οὐκ ἄρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο (Philippiens II.6).” New Testament Studies 18:131–66.
- Carson, D. A.
- 1996 Exegetical Fallacies. 2nd edition. Grand Rapids: Baker.
- Chantraine, P.
- 1968–80 Dictionnaire étymologique de la langue grecque: Histoire des mots. Paris: Klincksieck.
- Chapple, A.
- 1992 “The Lord Is Near (Philippians 4:5b).” Pp. 149–65 in In the Fullness of Time: Biblical Studies in Honour of Archbishop Donald Robinson. Edited by David Peterson and John Pryor. Homebush West, NSW: Lancer (Anzea).

Cimosa, M.

1985 Il vocabulario di preghiera nel Pentateuco greco dei LXX. Rome: LAS.

Clarke, A. D.

1998 “‘Be Imitators of Me’: Paul’s Model of Leadership.” Tyndale Bulletin 49:329–60.

Collange, J.-F.

1979 The Epistle of Saint Paul to the Philippians. Translated by A. W. Heathcote. London: Epworth.

Comrie, B.

1976 Aspect: An Introduction to the Study of Verbal Aspect and Related Problems. Cambridge Textbooks in Linguistics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Cousar, C. B.

2001 Reading Galatians, Philippians, and 1 Thessalonians: A Literary and Theological Commentary. Reading the New Testament. Macon, GA: Smyth & Helwys.

Croy, N. C.

2003 “‘To Die Is Gain’ (Philippians 1:19–26): Does Paul Contemplate Suicide?” Journal of Biblical Literature 122:517–31.

Culpepper, R. A.

1980 “Co-workers in Suffering: Philippians 2:19–30.” Review and Expositor 77:349–58.

Dalton, W. J.

1979 “The Integrity of Philippians.” Biblica 60:97–102.

Danker, F. W.

1972 “Under Contract: A Form-Critical Study of Linguistic Adaptation in Romans.” Pp. 91–114 in Festschrift to Honor F. Wilbur Gingrich. Edited by E. H. Barth and R. E. Cocroft. Leiden: Brill.

Davis, C. W.

- 1999 Oral Biblical Criticism: The Influence of the Principles of Orality on the Literary Structure of Paul's Epistle to the Philippians. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 172. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.

Deissmann, G. A.

- 1892 Die neutestamentliche Formel "in Christo Jesu." Marburg: Elwert.

Delling, G.

- 1969 "Zum steigenden Gebrauch von Komposita mit ὑπέρ bei Paulus." Novum Testamentum 11:127–53.

Denis, A. M.

- 1958 "La fonction apostolique et la liturgie nouvelle en Esprit: Étude thématique des métaphores paulinienes du culte nouveau." Revue de sciences philosophiques et théologiques 42:617–56.

Denniston, J. D.

- 1954 The Greek Particles. 2nd edition. Oxford: Clarendon.

Dibelius, M.

- 1925 An die Thessalonischer I II; An die Philipper. Handbuch zum Neuen Testament 11. Tübingen: Mohr.

Doble, P.

- 2002 "'Vile Bodies' or Transformed Persons? Philippians 3.21 in Context." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 86:3–27.

Dockx, S.

- 1973 "Lieu et date de l'épître aux Philippiens." Revue biblique 80:230–46.

Dodd, C. H.

- 1953 The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel. London: Cambridge University Press.

Domanyi, T.

- 1979 Der Römerbriefkommentar des Thomas von Aquina: Ein

Beitrag zur Untersuchung seiner Auslegungsmethoden.
Besler und Berner Studien zur historischen und systematischen Theologie 39. Bern: Lang.

Duncan, G. S.

1929 St. Paul's Ephesian Ministry: A Reconstruction. London: Hodder & Stoughton.

Eadie, J.

1859 A Commentary on the Greek Text of the Epistle of Paul to the Philippians. London: Griffin.

Easton, B. S.

1932 "New Testament Ethical Lists." Journal of Biblical Literature 51:1–12.

Edart, J.-B.

2002 L'épître aux Philippiens: Rhétorique et composition stylistique. Études bibliques n.s. 45. Paris: Gabalda.

Ellicott, C. J.

1865 St. Paul's Epistles to the Philippians, the Colossians, and Philemon. 3rd edition. London: Longman.

Erasmus, D.

1962 Opera omnia. London: Gregg.

Ernst, J.

1974 Die Briefe an die Philipper, an Philemon, an die Kolosser, und an die Epheser. Regensburger Neues Testament.
Regensburg: Pustet.

Espy, J. M.

1985 "Paul's 'Robust Conscience' Re-examined." New Testament Studies 31:161–88.

Ewald, P.

1923 Der Brief des Paulus an die Philipper. Revised by G.
Wohlenberg. 4th edition. Kommentar zum Neuen Testament (T. Zahn) 11. Leipzig: Deichert.

Fabris, R.

2000 Lettera ai Filippesi, Lettera a Filemone. Scritti delle origini cristiane 11. Bologna: EDB.

Fee, G. D.

- 1987 The First Epistle to the Corinthians. New International Commentary on the New Testament. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- 1992 “Philippians 2:5–11: Hymn or Exalted Pauline Prose?” Bulletin for Biblical Research 2:29–46.
- 1995 Paul’s Letter to the Philippians. New International Commentary on the New Testament. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- 1999 Philippians. IVP New Testament Commentary Series 11. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity.

Feinberg, P. D.

- 1980 “The Kenosis and Christology: An Exegetical-Theological Analysis of Philippians 2:6–11.” Trinity Journal, n.s., 1:21–46.

Field, F.

- 1899 Notes on the Translation of the New Testament. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Fitzgerald, J. T. (ed.)

- 1996 Friendship, Flattery, and Frankness of Speech: Studies on Friendship in the New Testament World. Novum Testamentum Supplements 82. Leiden: Brill.

Fitzmyer, J. A.

- 1988 “The Aramaic Background of Philippians 2:6–11.” Catholic Biblical Quarterly 50:470–83.

Frame, J. M.

- 1987 The Doctrine of the Knowledge of God. Phillipsburg, NJ: Presbyterian & Reformed.

Friedrich, G.

- 1962 Der Brief an die Philipper. Das Neue Testament Deutsch 8. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Fuller, D. P.

- 1980 Gospel and Law: Contrast or Continuum? The Hermeneutics of Dispensationalism and Covenant

Theology. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

Funk, R. W.

- 1966 Language, Hermeneutic, and Word of God: The Problem of Language in the New Testament and Contemporary Theology. New York: Harper & Row.
- 1967 "The Apostolic Parousia: Form and Significance." Pp. 249–68 in Christian History and Interpretation: Festschrift for S. J. Knox. Edited by W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule, and R. R. Niebuhr. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Gaffin, R. B., Jr.

- 1978 The Centrality of the Resurrection: A Study in Paul's Soteriology. Grand Rapids: Baker.
- 1978–79 "The Usefulness of the Cross." Westminster Theological Journal 41:228–46.

Gamble, H., Jr.

- 1977 The Textual History of the Letter to the Romans: A Study in Textual and Literary Criticism. Studies and Documents 42. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

Gander, G.

- 1993 Les épîtres de Paul aux Colossiens et aux Philippiens: Nouveau commentaire d'après l'araméen, le grec et le latin. Saint-Légier, Switzerland: Contrastes.

Garland, D. E.

- 1985 "The Composition and Literary Unity of Philippians: Some Neglected Factors." Novum Testamentum 27:141–73.

Geoffrion, T. C.

- 1993 The Rhetorical Purpose and the Political and Military Character of Philippians: A Call to Stand Firm. Lewiston, NY: Mellen.

Georgi, D.

- 1964 "Der Christushymnus im Philipperbrief in liturgiegeschichtlicher Sicht." Pp. 263–93 in Zeit und Geschichte: Dankesgabe an R. Bultmann zum 80. Geburtstag. Edited by E. Dinkler. Tübingen: Mohr.

Gnilka, J.

- 1976 Der Philipperbrief: Auslegung. 2nd edition. Herders theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament 10/3. Freiburg: Herder.

Goodrich, A. T. S.

- 1913 The Book of Wisdom, with Introduction and Notes. Oxford Church Bible Commentary. New York: Macmillan.

Goodspeed, E. J.

- 1937 An Introduction to the New Testament. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- 1950 The Apostolic Fathers: An American Translation. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Greijdanus, S.

- 1937 De brief van den apostel Paulus aan de gemeenten te Philippi. Komentaar op het NT 9/2. Amsterdam: van Bottenburg.

Grelot, P.

- 1972 "Deux expressions difficiles de Philippiens 2, 6–7." Biblica 53:495–507.
- 1973a "Deux notes critiques sur Philippiens 2, 6–11." Biblica 54:169–86.
- 1973b "La valeur de οὐχ . . . ἀλλά . . . dans Philippiens 2, 6–7." Biblica 54:25–42.

Gundry, R. H.

- 1976 Sōma in Biblical Theology: With Emphasis on Pauline Anthropology. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 29. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- 1994 "Style and Substance in 'the Myth of God Incarnate' according to Philippians 2:6–11." Pp. 271–93 in Crossing the Boundaries: Essays in Biblical Interpretation in Honour of Michael D. Goulder. Edited by S. E. Porter et al. Biblical Interpretation Series 8. Leiden: Brill.

Gunther, J. J.

- 1972 Paul: Messenger and Exile. Valley Forge, PA: Judson.
- 1973 St. Paul's Opponents and Their Background: A Study of Apocalyptic and Jewish Sectarian Teachings. Novum Testamentum Supplements 35. Leiden: Brill.

Guthrie, G. H.

- 1995 "Cohesion Shifts and Stitches in Philippians." Pp. 36–59 in Discourse Analysis and Other Topics in Biblical Greek. Edited by S. E. Porter and D. A. Carson. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 113. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.

Hanson, A. T.

- 1987 The Paradox of the Cross in the Thought of St. Paul. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 17. Sheffield: JSOT Press.

Harnisch, W.

- 1999 "Die paulinische Selbstempfehlung als Plädoyer für den Gekreuzigten: Rhetorisch-hermeneutische Erwägungen zu Phil 3." Pp. 133–54 in Das Urchristentum in seiner literarischen Geschichte: Festschrift für Jürgen Becker zum 65. Geburtstag. Edited by U. Mell and U. B. Müller. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 100. Berlin: de Gruyter.

Harris, J. R.

- 1925–26 "A Factor of Old Testament Influence in the New Testament." Expository Times 37:6–11.

Haupt, E.

- 1902 Die Gefangenschaftsbriefe. 7th/6th edition. Kritisch-exegetischer Kommentar über das Neue Testament (Meyer-Kommentar) 8–9. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.

Hawthorne, G. F.

- 1983 Philippians. Word Biblical Commentary 43. Waco, TX: Word.

Hays, R. B.

- 1980 "Psalm 143 and the Logic of Romans 3." Journal of

- Biblical Literature* 99:107–15.
- 1983 The Faith of Jesus Christ: An Investigation of the Narrative Substructure of Galatians 3:1–4:11. Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series 56. Chico, CA: Scholars Press.
- 1989 Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of Paul. New Haven & London: Yale University Press.
- 2002 The Faith of Jesus Christ: The Narrative Substructure of Galatians 3:1–4:11. 2nd edition. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans/Dearborn, MI: Dove.
- HDB A Dictionary of the Bible. Edited by J. Hastings. 5 vols. New York: Scribner, 1902–4.
- Heitmüller, W.
- 1903 “In Namen Jesu”: Eine sprach- und religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum Neuen Testament, speziell zur altchristlichen Taufe. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- Hendriksen, W.
- 1962 Exposition of Philippians. New Testament Commentary 11. Grand Rapids: Baker.
- Hengel, W. S. van
- 1838 Commentarius perpetuus in epistulam Pauli ad Philippenses. Leiden: Luchtmans.
- Heriban, J.
- 1983 Retto προवेῖν e κένωσις : Studio esegetico su Fil 2, 1–5.6–11. Biblioteca di scienze religiose 51. Rome: LAS.
- HF The Greek New Testament according to the Majority Text. Edited by Zane C. Hodges and Arthur L. Farstad. Nashville: Nelson, 1982.
- Hofius, O.
- 1991 Der Christushymnus Philipper 2, 6–11: Untersuchungen zu Gestalt und Aussage eines urchristlichen Psalms. 2nd edition. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 17. Tübingen: Mohr (Siebeck).
- Holloway, P. A.

- 2001 Consolation in Philippians: Philosophical Sources and Rhetorical Strategy. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 112. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Holmstrand, J.

- 1997 Markers and Meaning in Paul: An Analysis of I Thessalonians, Philippians and Galatians. Translated by M. Naylor. Coniectanea biblica: New Testament Series 28. Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell.

Hooker, M. D.

- 1975 “Philippians 2:6–11.” Pp. 151–64 in Jesus und Paulus: Festschrift für Werner Georg Kümmel zum 70. Geburtstag. Edited by E. E. Ellis and E. Grasser. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- 2000 “Adam Redivivus: Philippians 2 Once More.” Pp. 220–34 in The Old Testament in the New: Essays in Honour of J. L. North. Edited by S. Moyise. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 189. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- 2002 “Philippians: Phantom Opponents and the Real Source of Conflict.” Pp. 377–95 in Fair Play: Diversity and Conflicts in Early Christianity: Essays in Honour of Heikki Räisänen. Edited by I. Dunderberg et al. Novum Testamentum Supplements 103. Leiden: Brill.

Hoover, R. W.

- 1971 “The Harpagmos Enigma: A Philological Solution.” Harvard Theological Review 64:95–119.

Hotze, G.

- 1997 Paradoxien bei Paulus: Untersuchungen zu einer elementaren Denkform in seiner Theologie. Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen, n.F., 33. Münster: Aschendorff.

Hughes, P. E.

- 1962 Paul's Second Epistle to the Corinthians. New International Commentary on the New Testament. Grand Rapids:

- Eerdmans.
- 1984 Lefèvre: Pioneer of Ecclesiastical Renewal in France.
Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Hunt, A. S., and C. C. Edgar (eds.)
- 1932–34 Select Papyri. Loeb Classical Library. New York: Putnam.
- Hurst, L. D.
- 1986 “Re-enter the Pre-existence of Christ in Philippians 2:5–11.” New Testament Studies 32:449–57.
- Hurtado, L. W.
- 1984 “Jesus as Lordly Example in Philippians 2:5–11.” Pp. 113–26 in From Jesus to Paul: Studies in Honour of Francis Wright Beare. Edited by P. Richardson and J. C. Hurd. Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press.
- Huther, J. E.
- 1890 Critical and Exegetical Hand-Book to the Epistles to Timothy and Titus. Meyer’s Commentary. New York: Funk & Wagnalls.
- Janzen, J. G.
- 1996 “Creation and New Creation in Philippians 1:6.” Horizons in Biblical Theology 18:27–54.
- Jaquette, J. L.
- 1994 “A Not-So-Noble Death: Figured Speech, Friendship and Suicide in Philippians 1:21–26.” Neotestamentica 28:177–92.
- Jeremias, J.
- 1963 “Zu Phil ii 7: ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν.” Novum Testamentum 6:182–88.
- Jewett, R.
- 1970a “Conflicting Movements in the Early Church as Reflected in Philippians.” Novum Testamentum 12:362–90.
- 1970b “The Epistolary Thanksgiving and the Integrity of Philippians.” Novum Testamentum 12:40–53.
- Johnstone, R.
- 1875 Lectures, Exegetical and Practical, on the Epistle of Paul to the Philippians: With a Revised Translation of the Epistle and Notes on the Greek Text. Edinburgh: Oliphant.

Käsemann, E.

- 1968 "A Critical Analysis of Philippians 2:5–11." Pp. 45–88 in God and Christ: Existence and Province. Edited by R. W. Funk. Journal for Theology and the Church 5. New York: Harper & Row/Tübingen: Mohr.
- 1969 New Testament Questions of Today. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- 1980 Commentary on Romans. Translated and edited by G. W. Bromiley. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

Kennedy, G. A.

- 1984 New Testament Interpretation through Rhetorical Criticism. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press.

Kennedy, H. A. A.

- 1897–1910 "The Epistle of Paul to the Philippians." Vol. 2 / pp. 397–473 in The Expositor's Greek Testament. Edited by W. R. Nicoll. New York: Hodder & Stoughton.

Kennel, G.

- 1995 Frühchristliche Hymnen? Gattungskritische Studien zur Frage nach den Liedern der frühen Christenheit. Wissenschaftliche Monographien zum Alten und Neuen Testament 71. Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag.

Kent, H. A., Jr.

- 1978 "Philippians." Vol. 11 / pp. 93–159 in The Expositor's Bible Commentary. Edited by F. E. Gaebelin. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.

Kilpatrick, G. D.

- 1968 "Βλέπετε: Philippians 3.2." Pp. 146–48 in In Memoriam Paul Kahle. Edited by M. Black and G. Fohrer. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 103. Berlin: Topelmann.

Kim, S.

- 1982 The Origin of Paul's Gospel. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 2/4. Tübingen:

Mohr-Siebeck/Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

Kim, Y. K.

- 1988 "Palaeographical Dating of P⁴⁶ to the Later First Century." Biblica 69:248–57.

Klijn, A. F. J.

- 1964 "Paul's Opponents in Philippians iii." Novum Testamentum 7:278–84.
- 1969 De brief van Paulus aan de Filippenzen. De predikking van het Nieuwe Testament. Nijkerk: Callenbach.

Kline, M. G.

- 1983 "Of Works and Grace." Presbyterion 9:85–92.

Klöpper, A.

- 1893 Der Brief des Apostels Paulus an die Philipper erläutert. Gotha: Perthes.

Koester, H.

- 1961–62 "The Purpose of the Polemic of a Pauline Fragment (Philippians III)." New Testament Studies 8:317–32.
- 1982 New Testament Introduction. 2 vols. Hermeneia: Foundations and Facets. Philadelphia: Fortress.

Koperski, V.

- 1992a "Feminist Concerns and the Authorial Readers in Philippians." Louvain Studies 17:269–92.
- 1992b "Textlinguistics and the Integrity of Philippians: A Critique of Wolfgang Schenk's Arguments for a Compilation Hypothesis." Ephemerides theologicae lovanienses 68:331–67.
- 1993 "The Early History of the Dissection of Philippians." Journal of Theological Studies 44:599–603.
- 1996 The Knowledge of Christ Jesus My Lord: The High Christology of Philippians 3:7–11. Contributions to Biblical Exegesis and Theology 16. Kampen: Kok Pharos.

Krupp, R. A.

- 1984 Saint John Chrysostom: A Scripture Index. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.

Lapide, C. à

1864 Commentarii in Scripturam Sacram. Lyon: Pelagaud.

Lees, H. C.

1925–26 “Entre nous.” Expository Times 37:46.

Lenski, R. C. H.

1937 The Interpretation of St. Paul’s Epistles to the Galatians, to the Ephesians, and to the Philippians. Minneapolis: Augsburg.

Levinsohn, S. H.

1995 “A Discourse Study of Constituent Order and the Article in Philippians.” Pp. 60–74 in Discourse Analysis and Other Topics in Biblical Greek. Edited by S. E. Porter and D. A. Carson. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 113. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.

Lightfoot, J. B.

1868 St. Paul’s Epistle to the Philippians: A Revised Text with Introduction, Notes, and Dissertations. London: Macmillan.

1879 St. Paul’s Epistles to the Colossians and Philemon: A Revised Text with Introduction, Notes, and Dissertations. London: Macmillan.

1890 St. Paul’s Epistle to the Galatians: A Revised Text with Introduction, Notes, and Dissertations. 10th edition. London: Macmillan.

Lincoln, A. T.

1981 Paradise Now and Not Yet : Studies in the Role of the Heavenly Dimension in Paul’s Thought, with Special Reference to His Eschatology. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 43. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Lipsius, R. A.

1892 Briefe an die Galater, Römer, Philipper. 2nd edition. Hand-commentar zum Neuen Testament 2/2. Freiburg: Mohr.

Llewelyn, S. R.

- 1995 "Sending Letters in the Ancient World: Paul and the Philippians." Tyndale Bulletin 46:337–56.
- Lohmeyer, E.
- 1928 Kyrios Jesus: Eine Untersuchung zu Phil. 2, 5–11. Sitzungsberichte der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-Historische Klasse, Jahrg. 1927–28, 4. Abhandlung, 18. Heidelberg: Winter.
- 1953 Der Brief an die Philipper. 9th edition. Kritisch-exegetischer Kommentar über das Neue Testament (Meyer-Kommentar) 9/1. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- López, E.
- 1975 "En torno a Fil 3, 12." Estudios bíblicos 34:121–23.
- Louw, J. P.
- 1982 Semantics of New Testament Greek. Semeia Studies. Philadelphia: Fortress/Chico, CA: Scholars Press.
- LSJ A Greek-English Lexicon. By H. G. Liddell, R. Scott, and H. S. Jones. Oxford: Clarendon, 1968.
- Luter, A. B.
- 1996 "Partnership in the Gospel: The Role of Women in the Church at Philippi." Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 39:411–20.
- Luter, A. B., and M. V. Lee
- 1995 "Philippians as Chiasmus: Key to the Structure, Unity and Theme Questions." New Testament Studies 41:89–101.
- MacKay, B. S.
- 1960–61 "Further Thoughts on Philippians." New Testament Studies 7:161–70.
- Malherbe, A. J.
- 1995 "Paul's Self-Sufficiency (Philippians 4:11)." Pp. 813–26 in Texts and Contexts: Biblical Texts in Their Textual and Situational Contexts: Essays in Honor of Lars Hartman. Edited by T. Fornberg and D. Hellholm. Oslo: Scandinavian University Press.
- Malinowsky, F. X.

- 1985 "The Brave Women of Philippi." Biblical Theological Bulletin 15:60–64.
- Manzi, F.
- 1999 "La dipendenza letteraria diretta de Fil 2, 5–11 da Is 52, 13–53, 12." Rivista biblica 47:277–360.
- Marshall, I. H.
- 1992 The Epistle to the Philippians. Epworth Commentaries. London: Epworth.
- Martin, R. P.
- 1976 Philippians. New Century Bible. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- 1997 A Hymn of Christ: Philippians 2:5–11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity. Originally published as Carmen Christi: Philippians ii.5–11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Chistian Worship. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 4. London: Cambridge University Press, 1967.
- Martin, R. P., and B. J. Dodd
- 1998 Where Christology Began: Essays on Philippians 2. Louisville: Westminster John Knox.
- Matter, H. M.
- 1965 De brief van Paulus aan de Philippenzen en de brief aan Philémon. Commentar op het Nieuwe Testament. Kampen: Kok.
- Mayer, B.
- 1987 "Paulus als Vermittler zwischen Epaphroditus und der Gemeinde von Philippi: Bemerkungen zu Phil 2, 25–30." Biblische Zeitschrift 31:176–88.
- McKay, K. L.
- 1981 "On the Perfect and Other Aspects in New Testament Greek." Novum Testamentum 23:289–329.
- McNally, R. E.
- 1959 The Bible in the Early Middle Ages. Westminster, MD: Newman. Reprinted Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1986.

Melick, R. R.

- 1991 Philippians, Colossians, Philemon. New American Commentary 32. Nashville: Broadman.

Mengel, B.

- 1982 Studien zum Philipperbrief: Untersuchungen zum situativen Kontext unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Frage nach der Ganzheitlichkeit oder Einheitlichkeit eines paulinischen Briefes. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 2/8. Tübingen: Mohr.

Metzger, B. M.

- 1992 The Text of the New Testament: Its Transmission, Corruption, and Restoration. 3rd edition. New York: Oxford University Press.
- 1994 A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament. 2nd edition. Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft.

Metzner, R.

- 2002 "In aller Freundschaft: Ein frühchristlicher Fall freundschaftlicher Gemeinschaft (Phil 2.25–30)." New Testament Studies 48:111–31.

Meyer, H. A. W.

- 1885 Critical and Exegetical Hand-Book to the Epistles to the Philippians and Colossians, and to Philemon. New York: Funk & Wagnalls.

Michael, J. H.

- 1928 The Epistle of Paul to the Philippians. Moffatt New Testament Commentary 10. London: Hodder & Stoughton.

Miller, E. C., Jr.

- 1982 "Πολιτεύεσθε in Philippians 1.27: Some Philological and Thematic Observations." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 15:86–96.

MM

- The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament: Illustrated from the Papyri and Other Non-literary Sources*. By J. H. Moulton and G. Milligan. Reprinted Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1976.

Moda, A.

1985 "La Lettera a Filippesi e gli ultimi anni di Paolo prigioniero." Bibbia e oriente 27:17–30.

Moffatt, J.

1912–13 "Found in Him." Expository Times 24:46.

Moiser, J.

1997 "The Meaning of Koilia in Philippians 3:19." Expository Times 108:365–66.

Moo, D. J.

1982 Review of Gospel and Law, by D. P. Fuller. Trinity Journal, n.s., 3:99–103.

1983 "'Law,' 'Works of the Law,' and Legalism in Paul." Westminster Theological Journal 45:73–100.

1987 "Paul and the Law in the Last Ten Years." Scottish Journal of Theology 40:287–307.

Motyer, J. A.

1984 The Message of Philippians: Jesus Our Joy. The Bible Speaks Today. Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity.

Moule, C. F. D.

1970 "Further Reflexions on Philippians 2:5–11." Pp. 264–76 in Apostolic History and the Gospel: Biblical and Historical Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce on His 60th Birthday. Edited by W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

Müller, J. J.

1955 The Epistle of Paul to the Philippians and to Philemon. New International Commentary on the New Testament. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

Müller, U. B.

1988 "Der Christushymnus Phil 2.6–11." Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 79:17–44.

1993 Der Brief des Paulus an die Philipper. Theologischer Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament 11/1. Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt.

- 1999 "Der Brief aus Ephesus: Zeitliche Plazierung und theologische Einordnung des Philipperbriefes im Rahmen der Paulusbriefe." Pp. 155–71 in Das Urchristentum in seiner literarischen Geschichte: Festschrift für Jürgen Becker zum 65. Geburtstag. Edited by U. Mell and U. B. Müller. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 100. Berlin: de Gruyter.
- Murray, J.
- 1961 Redemption: Accomplished and Applied. London: Banner of Truth.
- 1976–82 "Definitive Sanctification." Vol. 2 / pp. 277–84 in Collected Writings of John Murray. Edinburgh: Banner of Truth.
- NA²⁷ Novum Testamentum Graece. Edited by [E. and E. Nestle], B. and K. Aland, J. Karavidopoulos, C. M. Martini, and B. M. Metzger. 27th rev. edition. Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1993.
- Nebeker, G. L.
- 2000 "Christ as Somatic Transformer (Phil 3:20–21): Christology in an Eschatological Perspective." Trinity Journal, n.s., 21:165–87.
- Newton, M.
- 1985 The Concept of Purity at Qumran and in the Letters of Paul. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 53. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- NIDNTT The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology. Edited by L. Coenen, E. Beyreuther, and H. Bietenhard. English translation edited by C. Brown. 4 vols. Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1975–86.
- NPNF A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers of the Christian Church. Edited by Philip Schaff. 1st series. Reprinted Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979.
- Oakes, P.
- 2001 Philippians: From People to Letter. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 110. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

O'Brien, P. T.

- 1977 Introductory Thanksgivings in the Letters of Paul. Novum Testamentum Supplements 49. Leiden: Brill.
- 1978 "The Fellowship Theme in Philippians." Reformed Theological Review 37:9–18.
- 1986 "The Importance of the Gospel in Philippians." Pp. 213–33 in God Who Is Rich in Mercy: Essays Presented to Dr. D. B. Knox. Edited by P. T. O'Brien and D. G. Peterson. Homebush West, NSW: Lancer.
- 1991 The Epistle to the Philippians: A Commentary on the Greek Text. New International Greek Testament Commentary. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.

OCD The Oxford Classical Dictionary. Edited by S. Hornblower and A. Spawforth. 3rd edition. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996.

O'Neill, J. C.

- 1988 "Hoover on Harpagmos Reviewed, with a Modest Proposal concerning Philippians 2:6." Harvard Theological Review 81:445–49.

Osiek, C.

- 2000 Philippians; Philemon. Abingdon New Testament Commentaries. Nashville: Abingdon.

OTP The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha. Edited by J. H. Charlesworth. 2 vols. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1983–85.

Otto, R.

- 1995 "'If Possible I May Attain the Resurrection from the Dead' (Philippians 3:11)." Catholic Biblical Quarterly 57:324–40.

Panikulam, G.

- 1979 Koinōnia in the New Testament: A Dynamic Expression of Christian Life. Analecta biblica 85. Rome: Biblical Institute Press.

Parker, T. H. L.

- 1971 Calvin's New Testament Commentaries. Grand Rapids:

Eerdmans.

Pedersen, S.

1978 "Mit Furcht und Zittern." Studia theologica 32:1–31.

Perkin, V.

1986 "Some Comments on the Pauline Prescripts." Irish Biblical Studies 8:92–99.

Peterlin, D.

1995 Paul's Letter to the Philippians in the Light of Disunity in the Church. Novum Testamentum Supplements 79. Leiden: Brill.

Peterman, G. W.

1997 Paul's Gift from Philippi: Conventions of Gift Exchange and Christian Giving. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 92. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

PG

Patrologiae cursus completus: Series graeca. Edited by J.-P. Migne. 161 vols. Paris, 1857–66.

Pilhofer, P.

1995 Philippi, vol. 1: Die erste christliche Gemeinde Europas. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 87. Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck.

2000 Philippi, vol. 2: Katalog der Inschriften von Philippi. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 119. Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck.

PL

Patrologiae cursus completus: Series latina. Edited by J.-P. Migne. 221 vols. Paris, 1844–64.

Porter, S. E., and D. A. Carson (eds.)

1995 Discourse Analysis and Other Topics in Biblical Greek. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 113. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.

Porter, S. E., and J. T. Reed

1998 "Philippians as a Macro-chiasm and Its Exegetical Significance." New Testament Studies 44:213–31.

Poythress, V. S.

- 1987 Symphonic Theology: The Validity of Multiple Perspectives in Theology. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- 2002 “‘Hold Fast’ versus ‘Hold Out’ in Philippians 2:16.” Westminster Theological Journal 64:45–53.
- Price, J. D.
- 1987 “A Computer-Aided Textual Commentary on the Book of Philippians.” Grace Theological Journal 8:253–90.
- Räsänen, H.
- 1987 “Paul’s Conversion and the Development of His View of the Law.” New Testament Studies 33:404–19.
- Reed, J. T.
- 1991 “The Infinitive with Two Substantival Accusatives: An Ambiguous Construction?” Novum Testamentum 33:1–27.
- 1996 “Philippians 3:1 and the Epistolary Hesitation Formula: The Literary Integrity of Philippians, Again.” Journal of Biblical Literature 115:63–90.
- 1997 A Discourse Analysis of Philippians: Method and Rhetoric in the Debate over Literary Integrity. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 136. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- Reeves, R. R.
- 1992 “‘To Be or Not to Be?’ That Is Not the Question: Paul’s Choice in Philippians 1:22.” Perspectives in Religious Studies 19:273–89.
- Reumann, J.
- 1986 “Philippians 3.20–21: A Hymnic Fragment?” New Testament Studies 30:593–609.
- Ridderbos, H.
- 1975 Paul: An Outline of His Theology. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Rilliet, A.
- 1841 Commentaire sur l’épître de l’apôtre Paul aux Philippiens. Geneva: Beroud.
- Robertson, A. T.

- 1934 A Grammar of the Greek New Testament in the Light of Historical Research. 4th edition. Nashville: Broadman.
- Roetzel, C. J.
- 1975 The Letters of Paul: Conversations in Context. Atlanta: John Knox.
- Ross, J. M.
- 1983 “Some Unnoticed Points in the Text of the New Testament.” Novum Testamentum 25:59–72.
- Royse, J. R.
- 1981 “Scribal Habits in Early Greek New Testament Papyri.” Th.D. diss., Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley, CA.
- Rummel, E.
- 1986 Erasmus’ Annotations on the New Testament: From Philologist to Theologian. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Russell, R.
- 1982 “Pauline Letter Structure in Philippians.” Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 25:295–306.
- Sanders, E. P.
- 1983 Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Sandnes, K. O.
- 2002 Belly and Body in the Pauline Epistles. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 120. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sass, M. G.
- 1941 “Zur Bedeutung von Δοῦλος bei Paulus.” Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 40:24–32.
- Schenk, W.
- 1984 Die Philipperbriefe des Paulus: Kommentar. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer.
- 1994 “Der Philipperbrief oder die Philipperbriefe des Paulus? Eine Antwort an V. Koperski.” Ephemerides theologiae lovanienses 70:122–31.

Schmithals, W.

- 1972 Paul and the Gnostics. Translated by J. E. Steely.
Nashville: Abingdon.

Schnider, F., and W. Stenger

- 1987 Studien zum neutestamentlichen Briefformular. New Testament Tools and Studies 11. Leiden: Brill.

Schreiber, S.

- 2003 "Paulus im 'Zwischenzustand': Phil 1.23 und die Ambivalenz des Sterbens als Provokation." New Testament Studies 49:336–59.

Schubert, P.

- 1939 Form and Function of the Pauline Thanksgivings. Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 20. Berlin: Töpelmann.

Schütz, J. H.

- 1975 Paul and the Anatomy of Apostolic Authority. Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 26. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Schweizer, E.

- 1985 "Die Christologie von Phil 2, 6–11 und Q." Theologische Zeitschrift 41:258–63.

Silva, M.

- 1976–77 "Perfection and Eschatology in Hebrews." Westminster Theological Journal 39:60–71.
- 1978 "New Lexical Semitisms?" Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 69:253–57.
- 1980 "The Pauline Style as Lexical Choice: Γινώσκειν and Related Verbs." Pp. 184–207 in Pauline Studies: Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce. Edited by D. A. Hagner and M. J. Harris. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- 1984 Review of Philippians, by G. F. Hawthorne. Westminster Theological Journal 46:413–16.
- 1985 "Internal Evidence in the Text-Critical Use of the LXX." Pp. 151–67 in La Septuaginta en la investigación

- contemporánea*. Edited by N. Fernández Marcos. Textos y Estudios “Cardenal Cisneros” 34. Madrid: C.S.I.C.
- 1986 “The Place of Historical Reconstruction in New Testament Criticism.” Pp. 109–33 in Hermeneutics, Authority, and Canon. Edited by D. A. Carson and J. D. Woodbridge. Reprinted Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995.
- 1987 Has the Church Misread the Bible? The History of Interpretation in the Light of Current Issues. Foundations of Contemporary Interpretation 1. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- 1990 God, Language, and Scripture: Reading the Bible in the Light of General Linguistics. Foundations of Contemporary Interpretation 4. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- 1994 Biblical Words and Their Meaning: An Introduction to Lexical Semantics. Rev. edition. Grand Rapids: Zondervan.
- 1995 “Discourse Analysis and Philippians.” Pp. 102–6 in Discourse Analysis and Other Topics in Biblical Greek. Edited by S. E. Porter and D. A. Carson. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 113. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.
- 1996 Review of Paul’s Letter to the Philippians in the Light of Disunity in the Church, by D. Peterlin. Journal of Biblical Literature 115:764–65.
- 1998 Review of The Knowledge of Christ Jesus My Lord, by V. Koperski. Journal of Biblical Literature 117:155–56.
- 2001 Interpreting Galatians: Explorations in Exegetical Method. 2nd edition. Grand Rapids: Baker.
- 2004 “Faith versus Works of Law in Galatians.” Pp. 217–48 in Justification and Variegated Nomism: A Fresh Appraisal of Paul and Second Temple Judaism, vol. 2: The Paradoxes of Paul. Edited by D. A. Carson, P. T. O’Brien, and M. A. Seifrid. Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 2/181. Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck/Grand Rapids: Baker.

Smyth, H. W.

- 1956 Greek Grammar. Revised by G. M. Messing. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Souter, A. (ed.)
- 1922–26 Pelagius's Expositions of Thirteen Epistles of St. Paul. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- 1927 The Earliest Latin Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul: A Study. Oxford: Clarendon.
- Spicq, C.
- 1978–82 Notes de lexicographie néo-testamentaire. Orbis biblicus et orientalis 22. Fribourg: Éditions Universitaires/Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht.
- Staab, K.
- 1933 Pauluskommentare aus der griechischen Kirche, aus Katenenhandschriften gesammelt und herausgegeben. Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen 15. Münster: Aschendorff.
- Stanley, D.
- 1984 “Imitation in Paul’s Letters: Its Significance for His Relationship to Jesus and to His Own Christian Foundations.” Pp. 127–41 in From Jesus to Paul: Studies in Honour of Francis Wright Beare. Edited by P. Richardson and J. C. Hurd. Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press.
- Stendahl, K.
- 1963 “The Apostle Paul and the Introspective Conscience of the West.” Harvard Theological Review 56:199–215.
- Strimple, R. B.
- 1978–79 “Philippians 2:5–11 in Recent Studies: Some Exegetical Conclusions.” Westminster Theological Journal 41:247–68.
- Swete, H. B. (ed.)
- 1880–82 Theodori episcopi Mopsuesteni in epistolas B. Pauli commentarii: The Latin Version with the Greek Fragments. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Swift, R. C.

- 1984 "The Theme and Structure of Philippians." Bibliotheca sacra 141:234–54.
- TDNT Theological Dictionary of the New Testament. Edited by G. Kittel and G. Friedrich. Translated and edited by G. W. Bromiley. 10 vols. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1964–76.
- Tellbe, M.
- 1994 "The Sociological Factors behind Philippians 3:1–11 and the Conflict at Philippi." Journal for the Study of the New Testament 55:97–121.
- Thrall, M. F.
- 1962 Greek Particles in the New Testament: Linguistic and Exegetical Studies. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- Tischendorf, C. von
- 1869–72 Novum Testamentum Graece. 8th edition. Leipzig: Hinrichs.
- Treiyer, E.
- 1996 "S'en aller et être avec Christ: Philippiens 1:23." Andrews University Seminary Studies 34:47–64.
- Trench, R. C.
- 1880 Synonyms of the New Testament. 9th edition. Reprinted Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1963.
- Turrado, L.
- 1965 Biblia comentada, vol. 6: Hechos de los Apóstoles y epístolas paulinas. Biblioteca de autores cristianos 243. Madrid: Editorial Católica.
- Tyson, J. B.
- 1976 "Paul's Opponents at Philippi." Perspectives in Religious Studies 3:82–95.
- UBS⁴ The Greek New Testament. Edited by B. Aland, K. Aland, J. Karavidopoulos, C. M. Martini, and B. M. Metzger. 4th rev. edition. 2nd printing. Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1994.
- Victorinus, M.
- 1981 Commentari alle epistole di Paolo agli Efesini, ai Galati, ai Filippesi. Edited by F. Gori. Corona Patrum 8. Torino: Società Editrice Internazionale.

Vincent, M. R.

1897 A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistles to the Philippians and to Philemon. International Critical Commentary. Edinburgh: Clark.

Vogt, E.

1957 “‘Peace among Men of God’s Good Pleasure’: Lk. 2:14.” Pp. 114–17 in The Scrolls and the New Testament. Edited by K. Stendahl. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Vollenweider, S.

1994 “Die Waagschalen von Leben und Tod: Zum antiken Hintergrund von Phil 1, 21–26.” Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 85:93–115.

1999 “Der ‘Raub’ der Gottgleichheit: Ein religionsgeschichtlicher Vorschlag zu Phil 2.6(–11).” New Testament Studies 45:413–33.

Wagner, G.

1986 “Le scandale de la croix expliqué par le chant du Serviteur d’Isaïe 53: Réflexion zur Philippiens 2.6–11.” Études théologiques et religieuses 61:177–87.

Wanamaker, C. A.

1987 “Philippians 2.6–11: Son of God or Adamic Christology?” New Testament Studies 33:179–93.

Wansink, C. S.

1996 Chained in Christ: The Experience and Rhetoric of Paul’s Imprisonments. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 130. Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press.

Warfield, B. B.

1932 “On the Biblical Notion of ‘Renewal.’” Pp. 351–74 in Biblical and Theological Studies. Philadelphia: Presbyterian & Reformed.

Watson, D. F.

- 1988 "A Rhetorical Analysis of Philippians and Its Implications for the Unity Question." Novum Testamentum 30:57–88.
- Wegener, M. I.
- 1998 "Philippians 2:6–11—Paul's (Revised) Hymn to Jesus." Currents in Theology and Missions 25:507–17.
- Weiss, B.
- 1859 Der Philipper-Brief ausgelegt und die Geschichte seiner Auslegung kritisch dargestellt. Berlin: Hertz.
- Weiss, K.
- 1954 "Paulus—Priester der christlicher Kultgemeinde." Theologische Literaturzeitung 79:355–64.
- Westcott, B. F., and F. J. A. Hort
- 1881 The New Testament in the Original Greek. Cambridge: Macmillan. Reprinted Graz, Austria: Akademische Druck- und Verlagsanstalt, 1974.
- Westerholm, S.
- 2003 Perspectives Old and New on Paul: The "Lutheran" Paul and His Critics. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans.
- White, J. L.
- 1972 The Form and Function of the Body of the Greek Letter: A Study of the Letter-Body in the Non-literary Papyri and in Paul the Apostle. Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series 5. Missoula, MT: Scholars Press.
- 1986 Light from Ancient Letters. Philadelphia: Fortress.
- Wick, P.
- 1994 Der Philipperbrief: Der formale Aufbau des Briefs als Schlüssel zum Verständnis seines Inhalts. Beiträge zur Wissenschaft von Alten und Neuen Testament 7/15. Stuttgart: Kohlhammer.
- Wiesinger, A.
- 1858 "Exposition of the Epistle to the Philippians." Vol. 5 / pp. 341–461 in Biblical Commentary on the New Testament. Edited by H. Olshausen. New York: Sheldon, Blakeman & Co.

Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, U. von

- 1907 “Die griechische Literatur des Altertums.” In Die griechische und lateinische Literatur und Sprache. By U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, K. Krumbacher, et al. 2nd edition. Berlin: Teubner.

Wiles, M. F.

- 1967 The Divine Apostle: The Interpretation of St. Paul's Epistles in the Early Church. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- 1970 “Theodore of Mopsuestia as Representative of the Antiochene School.” Pp. 489–510 in The Cambridge History of the Bible, vol. 1: From the Beginnings to Jerome. Edited by P. R. Ackroyd and C. F. Evans. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Williams, D. K.

- 2002 Enemies of the Cross of Christ: The Terminology of the Cross and Conflict in Philippians. Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series 223. London: Sheffield Academic Press.

Winer, G. R.

- 1882 A Treatise on the Grammar of New Testament Greek, Regarded as a Sure Basis for New Testament Exegesis. Translated by W. F. Moulton from the 3rd German edition. 9th English edition. Edinburgh: Clark.

Witherington, B., III

- 1994 Friendship and Finances in Philippi: The Letter of Paul to the Philippians. Valley Forge, PA: Trinity.

Wong, T. Y.-C.

- 1986 “The Problem of Pre-existence in Philippians 2, 6–11.” Ephemerides theologicae lovanienses 62:267–82.

Wright, N. T.

- 1986 “Ἀρπαγμός and the Meaning of Philippians 2:5–11.” Journal of Theological Studies 37:321–52.

WW

- Novum Testamentum Domini Nostri Iesu Christi Latine:*

Secundum editionem Sancti Hieronymi. Edited by J.
Wordsworth, H. J. White, et al. 3 vols. Oxford: Clarendon, 1889–1954.

Index of Subjects

- abundance 206
- Achaia 39
- Adam-Christ analogy 101, 102, 107
- adversity 62, 69, 128–29
- afflictions. See suffering
- Alexandrian text-type 24
- already/not yet 187
- antinomians 8, 170–71, 180, 182
- anxiety 195–96, 204
- Aphrodite 141
- apostasy 71
- apostle 39
- argumentatio* 18
- Aristotelian philosophy 100
- aspectual distinctions 11
- assurance 68, 165–67, 208
- athletic imagery 174–75

- baptism 164–65
- belly 181n16
- beloved 185
- benediction 210
- Benjamite descent 150
- blameless 51, 126
- blessing 207
- boasting 76, 127, 149–50
- brothers 179
- business metaphor 206–7

- Caesarea 5, 7
- calling 176
- Carmen Christi* 20–21, 27, 31, 93, 98, 104, 108, 112
- children 124
- Christ-hymn. See Carmen Christi
- Christian life 166
- Christology 21
- church
 - and sanctification 72, 82
 - as true Israel 80n1
- church leaders 124, 192–93
- church officers 40–41, 63
- circumcision 147, 148–49, 150, 181 citizenship 79, 80, 84, 88, 117, 150n5, 164, 184, 186, 197

Clement 2, 192–93
community 82, 119, 121 conduct 51–52, 79, 98, 107, 120 confidence 149, 171, 176 conflicts 83 consistency 81. See also perseverance consolation 19 consummation 45–46 contentment 194, 196, 204, 205–8 contextual synonymy 11n12, 32 conversion 121, 164n19
Corinth 2, 149–50
Corinthians 206 creation 45–46, 70 cross 34, 107 crown 186 crucifixion 107

Damascus experience 156, 163n16
Day of Christ 52, 98, 175 deacons 40
death 72–74, 75, 77, 128–29, 164–65 deliverance 69, 72, 120 desire 73 discernment 50, 178
discouragement 20, 86, 129 discourse analysis 12, 13, 17 disobedience 107
Dispersion 153 dissension 4, 88, 117, 124 doctrine 30, 155 dogs 125, 147, 158, 180 doubt 166–67 dung 157

earthly-mindedness 183 ecclesiology 80n1 enemies, of the cross 8, 180, 182 envy 91
Epaphroditus 2, 4, 6, 135, 138–40, 141, 142, 152, 192, 193
Ephesus 5, 6–7
epistolary analysis 17, 18–19 eschatology 111, 126, 149, 175 essence 100, 101, 113 ethics, and redemptive history 97–98
Euodia 2, 4, 192–93
Europe 2 evangelism 62, 63 evil 84n4

excrement 157

exordium 18

faith 84, 161–62

faithfulness 89

false teachers 147 fate 123n6

faultlessness 151–52

Felix 142

finances 59

flesh 78, 149, 161, 181, 182

food regulations 180 form 100–101 of a servant 105–6

friendship 19, 204

fruit of righteousness 51–52 future 47, 175

Galatia, Galatians 3, 8, 148, 171 gambling 142

Gentiles 2–3, 8, 125, 147–48 glorification 84, 109, 155, 159, 165–67, 185

glory 101, 102, 149

gluttony 180

Gnosticism 170

God

 faithfulness 161

 glory 49, 58, 126, 127

 promises 175, 185

 sovereignty 45, 62, 118, 120–23

good works 147

gospel 47, 62

grace 22, 45, 47, 108, 109, 121–23, 160n10, 176, 205

gratitude 41, 45

happiness 194

heavenly citizenship 183–86

Heilsgeschichte, 160n10

Hellenism 100, 150, 153, 204

holiness 21

Holy Spirit 72, 76, 89, 148–49, 181 hope 70–71, 165–66, 172, 174, 183–86

hortatory section 190 human responsibility 45, 118, 120–23

human spirit 89

humility 21, 40, 79, 92, 123, 179, 184

hymn. See Carmen Christi

image of God 101

imitating Paul 188 immorality 180 imperative 127

impure motives 64 imputation 160 incarnation 99, 106, 115 in Christ 62, 96–97, 177. See also union with Christ inclusio 14, 190 indicative 127
intercessory prayer 37, 49
irony 152, 178n10
Israelites, complaining in wilderness 124–25
“Israel of God” 148

Jesus

death 92, 104, 105, 107, 164–65, 168–69, 207 deity 102, 103 exaltation 98, 108–11, 115, 127, 184 faithfulness 161
humanity 106 humiliation 93, 98–108, 115, 184 humility 117, 194
lordship 116
obedience 102, 106–7, 108, 109, 161 as object of worship 112, 115–16 resurrection 163–64, 168–69 return 52, 195
servanthood 92
spatial nearness 198 sufferings 84, 97, 163–65, 168–69 unselfishness 103, 104
Johannine theology 148
joy 10, 43–44, 68, 75–76, 86, 128–29, 185–86, 193–94, 205 Judaizers 3–4, 8–9, 15, 64–65, 82, 125, 145, 146–51, 158, 170–71, 179–82 justification 51, 109, 121, 146, 155, 159–63, 168 knowledge 21, 57, 78, 163–64, 174 and love 50

and sanctification 163

law 147, 152, 154, 160–61, 171 legalism 121, 123, 181 letter of friendship 19 liberalism 98n10
libertines 8, 170–71, 180
licentiousness 180, 181 likeness of men 105–6, 115 literary criticism 143–44 Lord’s Prayer 49
love 50, 126
Lydia 2

Macedonia 9, 39 martyrdom 31, 77, 128–29, 199 maturity 177 merits 123n6
Moses 130 mutilators 148, 171

narratio 18
new life 156, 164–65

obedience 79, 102, 107, 117–18, 178, 198, 207 external 152 obligations 81 offering 206, 207 old covenant 158 old life 156
oneness. See unity opponents 64–65, 82–83, 89 oral biblical criticism 18 overseers 40

pagan customs 148
paraenesis 190 participation, in the gospel 43–45, 46 patience 198
Paul

 affection for Philippians 48 apostolic authority 39, 149–50 appeal to own ministry 117 authorship of Philippians 1 boasting 149–50 conscience 151 conversion 155, 156–59
 death 128–29, 131, 138
 heritage 157–58 imprisonment 3–4, 6, 33, 59, 61, 138, 210
 opponents 8–9, 171
 suffering 73, 85

Pauline epistles closings 210 salutations 37, 38–39
 scribal tendencies 211–13

peace 195–96, 198 perfection 46, 49, 51–53, 126, 175 perfectionism 8, 52–53, 167, 171, 174, 178n10 peroratio 18
persecution 84 perseverance 22, 71, 81, 185 perverse generation 124, 125 petition 195, 199

Philippi 1, 2, 3

Philippians

canonical function 20

commentaries 34–36

exegetical history 26–34

genre 18–19

integrity of letter 12–14, 143–44 lexical distinctiveness 10–11

textual history 25–26

Philippians' gift 34, 59–60, 200–201, 205–6

praetorium 65

praise 207

prayer 37, 43, 55, 72, 195, 199

predestination 28, 64

presumptuousness 166 prize 176–77

probatio 18

progress, in the faith 75

propositio 18

proselytes 150

race metaphor 176

redemptive history 98

redundancy 11, 161n13

refutatio 18

rejoicing 20, 144n3, 194

repetition 42, 45

resurrection 74, 164n18, 165, 169, 174–75, 185

reward 109

rhetorical criticism 13, 17–18 righteousness 51, 107, 126, 158, 160–62 in the law 151–52

Rome 3–4, 5–7, 9

sacrifice 128–29, 207

salvation, working out 118–21 sanctification 21–22, 50, 52–53, 107, 109, 122–26, 155, 159, 163–65, 177, 179, 208 through the church 72, 82, 119

Scholasticism 28

self-distrust 176 selfishness 66, 87, 98, 103, 120, 140, 182, 194

selflessness 21

Septuagint 100–101

servanthood 39–40, 92, 99, 105–106

Servant of the Lord 114

sexual immorality 180 shame 71, 72, 128

sonship 125

soul 89

soul-sleep 74

spiritual warfare 38 steadfastness 89, 92
Stoicism 204 submission 111–12 suffering 33, 48, 69, 73, 83–85, 164, 165, 166, 208 suicide 73n7
Sulla 142
superiority 182
Syntyche 2, 4, 192–93 systematic theology 45, 159 Syzygos 193

tenacity 81–83
tense distinctions 11 textual criticism 143, 211 thanksgiving 41, 42, 55, 84, 195, 199 Thessalonica 2 thinking 21, 96
Timothy 2, 4, 38–40, 135, 136–38, 139, 140
Torah 154 travelogue 59, 134, 144 tribulation 70, 84
Trinity 114, 149
two ages 161n10

union with Christ 84, 95, 97, 162–63, 164–65, 168
unity 79, 85–88, 90, 92, 96, 117, 126, 179, 182, 188, 192 virtues 196–97, 199

well-being 119–20 wilderness 124 witness 62, 71, 81 worldliness 180 worry 196
worship 148–49
 of Jesus 112, 115–16

Index of Authors

Aland, B. 25n28
Aland, K. 10, 23, 25n28
Alexander, L. 18
Alford, H. 30, 35, 62, 91, 129–31, 131n18, 132, 199
Aquinas, T. 28, 28n35, 29, 34, 123n6
Arndt, W. 26n30
Attridge, H. W. 67n2
Aune, D. E. 38n1

Bakirtzis, C. 2n3
Barker, K. L. 154n9
Barth, G. 35
Barth, K. 35, 79, 108, 139
Bateman, H. W. 9n10
Bauer, W. 122
Baumert, N. 203n3
Baur, F. C. 1n2
BDF [F. Blass, A. Debrunner, and R. W. Funk] 43, 55, 55n14, 76, 77n10, 90, 133, 141, 157, 170,
189, 189n27, 203n4
BDR [F. Blass, A. Debrunner, and F. Rehkopf] 153
Beare, F. W. 35, 78, 116, 178
Bengel, J. A. 29n36, 34, 43
Berry, K. L. 19
Best, E. 40n3, 41
Betz, H. D. 197n6
Beyer, H. W. 41, 53n13
Binder, H. 101n18
Black, D. A. 13n16, 18, 85n5, 92n1
Bligh, J. 176n7, 203
Bloomquist, L. G. 33
Bockmuehl, M. 17, 19, 27n31, 33, 36, 54n14, 57, 65–66, 82, 97n7, 101n19, 125n10, 145n4
Bonnard, P. 31, 35, 124n8, 162
Boor, W. de 35
Bormann, L. 2n3, 33
Böttger, P. C. 182n17, 184n21, 189n26
Branson, M. L. 161n12
Breidenthal, H. 26n30
Brewer, R. 80n1
Broadus, J. A. 28n34
Bruce, F. F. 35, 52, 65–66, 90, 107
Brucker, R. 6n6, 18, 79n1, 113
Bruggen, J. van 78

Buchanan, C. O. 139

Cahill, D. M. 26n30

Caird, G. B. 35, 92n1, 153n7

Calvin, J. 28–29, 34, 64n1, 70, 75, 78, 88–90, 98n9, 108, 111, 121–22, 127, 149, 152, 166

Capper, B. J. 200n1

Carmignac, J. 113, 113n35

Carson, D. A. 17, 77

Chantraine, P. 66, 132n21

Chapple, A. 198

Chrysostom, J. 27–28, 28n34, 29, 34, 41, 45, 53, 57, 64n1, 76, 81, 87–89, 113n35, 122, 124n7, 130n15, 140–41, 157n5, 166n20, 175n6, 177, 177n9, 179n12, 187, 192, 196n4, 198, 207

Cimosa, M. 55n15

Clarke, A. D. 179n11

Collange, J.-F. 31, 35, 40n3, 41, 45, 67, 108, 125, 128, 130, 140, 174n5, 176

Comrie, B. 186n24

Cousar, C. B. 33, 36

Croy, N. C. 73 n. 7

Culpepper, R. A. 134n2

Dalton, W. J. 13n16

Danker, F. W. 206, 207n8

Davis, C. W. 18

Deissmann, G. A. 5n5, 95, 96

Delling, G. 115

Denis, A. M. 128

Denniston, J. D. 168, 168n23

Dibelius, M. 31n38, 35, 101n17, 106, 175

Doble, P. 184

Dockx, S. 7n7

Dodd, C. H. 95n3, 105n26

Domanyi, T. 28n35

Duncan, G. S. 5n5

Eadie, J. 30n37, 35, 108, 123n6

Easton, B. S. 197n6

Edart, J.-B. 13n16

Edgar, C. C. 38n1

Ellicott, C. J. 30n37, 35, 199

Erasmus, D. 28, 34

Ernst, J. 35

Espy, J. M. 151n6

Ewald, P. 31n38, 35, 56, 130, 174n5

Fabris, R. 33, 36

Fee, G. D. 19, 32–33, 36, 46, 47n9, 54n14, 65, 70, 76, 78, 85n5, 89–91, 92n1, 97n7, 113, 119n2, 133, 139n6, 147, 149, 155n1, 159n8, 164n17, 178n10, 193, 200n1, 202n2

Feinberg, P. D. 93n2

Field, F. 132

Fitzgerald, J. T. 19

Fitzmyer, J. A. 99n11
Foerster, W. 103n22
Frame, J. M. 101n17
Franke, A. H. 30
Friedrich, G. 35
Fuller, D. P. 154n9
Funk, R. W. 71n5, 134, 134n1

Gaffin, R. B., Jr. 85, 163
Gamble, H., Jr. 143
Gander, G. 33, 36
Garland, D. E. 13, 144nn2–3, 153n7, 190n1
Geoffrion, T. C. 33
Georgi, D. 100n13
Gerth, B. 77
Gnilka, J. 31, 35, 41, 44nn4–5, 79, 89, 95n3, 109, 114, 124n8, 130n15, 167n22, 168, 174n5, 181, 187
Goodrich, A. T. S. 65
Goodspeed, E. J. 78n11, 143n1
Greijdanus, S. 31n39, 35, 54, 70
Grelot, P. 99n11, 113n35, 114, 114n36
Grundmann, W. 82n2
Gundry, R. H. 77, 93n2, 114
Gunther, J. J. 7n8, 145n4, 171, 171n2
Guthrie, G. H. 17

Hanson, A. T. 148n4
Harnisch, W. 13n16, 144n2
Harris, J. R. 124n9
Haupt, E. 30, 35, 130n15
Hawthorne, G. F. 7n7–8, 31–32, 32n40, 36, 40, 48, 51, 56–57, 64n1, 65–66, 69–70, 71nn3–4, 76, 77,
78, 84, 86–87, 89–90, 96n4, 101, 103, 103n22, 105, 105n26, 108, 111, 111n32, 113, 115, 120,
124n8, 127–30, 131n17, 132, 134, 136–37, 137n4, 141, 147, 149, 152–53, 153n7, 157, 165, 167–
69, 171, 174, 176, 178, 183, 187–89, 192–93, 196–98, 204, 207–8
Hays, R. B. 70n2, 160n9, 161nn12–13
Heitmüller, W. 110
Hendriksen, W. 35, 80n1, 81, 127, 140, 165, 180n14
Hengel, W. S. van 29n36, 34
Heriban, J. 21, 88, 91, 96n5, 97n6, 97n8, 101n15, 101n17, 104nn23–24, 105n26, 111n32, 112,
114n37, 116n39
Hofius, O. 116n39
Holloway, P. A. 19–20, 73n7, 144n3
Holmstrand, J. 17
Hooker, M. D. 93n2, 97, 101n16, 113n35
Hoover, R. W. 103–4, 104n23
Hort, F. J. A. 23n24
Hotze, G. 155n2
Howard, G. 111n32
Hughes, P. E. 28, 122n5
Hunt, A. S. 38n1
Hurst, L. D. 102n20

Hurtado, L. W. 97n8, 98n10
Huther, J. E. 131

Jaeger, W. W. 103
Janzen, J. G. 46
Jaquette, J. L. 19, 73n7
Jeremias, J. 99n11, 106
Jewett, R. 171, 171n3, 174n5
Johnstone, R. 35, 58

Käsemann, E. 95, 98, 98n10, 100, 100n12, 100n14, 101, 160n9
Kennedy, G. A. 17n18
Kennedy, H. A. A. 35, 101n15, 103n22, 116, 126, 129, 133, 187
Kennel, G. 92n1
Kent, H. A., Jr. 35, 55n15
Ker, G. 113
Kilpatrick, G. D. 153, 153nn7–8
Kim, S. 101n16, 163n16
Kim, Y. K. 26n29
Klijn, A. F. J. 31n39, 35, 170–71
Kline, M. G. 109
Klöpper, A. 31n38, 35
Koester, H. 2n3, 153, 156, 170, 170n1, 171
Koperski, V. 12n14, 13n16, 33, 155n2, 192n2
Kotanski, R. 113n34
Krupp, R. A. 27n32
Kühner, R. 77

Lapide, C. à 34
Lee, M. V. 18
Lees, H. C. 142
Lefèvre d'Étaples, J. 28
Lenski, R. C. H. 35, 57, 80n1
Levinsohn, S. H. 17
Lightfoot, J. B. 6n5, 11, 12n15, 20, 20n19, 29n36, 30, 35, 44–45, 53–56, 57n17, 64–67, 69, 75n9, 76–78, 80, 86–91, 96, 100–101, 103n22, 106, 110, 113, 115–16, 126n11, 129, 129n14, 130–31,
132n20, 133, 136, 140–41, 150–51, 158, 162, 168–71, 178, 188, 192–94, 195n4, 198, 204, 205,
207, 210
Lincoln, A. T. 183–84, 189, 189n27
Lipsius, R. A. 31n38, 35
Llewelyn, S. R. 6n5
Lohmeyer, E. 7n8, 30–31, 31n38, 35, 44n5, 66, 79, 82n3, 93–94, 96n5, 99n11, 106, 108, 115, 128,
141, 153, 164n18, 170, 181, 199
López, E. 187n25
Louw, J. P. 17n18
Luter, A. B. 18, 192n2
Luther, M. 151, 203

MacKay, B. S. 143n1
Malherbe, A. J. 19, 204n6, 205n6

Malinowsky, F. X. 192n2, 205n7
Manzi, F. 114n37
Marshall, I. H. 33, 36
Martin, R. P. 32n40, 35, 45, 47, 51n10, 56–57, 77, 82, 97n6, 98, 98nn9–10, 101n16, 103n22, 107n29, 109–10, 114–15, 120, 131, 141, 152, 162, 166, 174, 178, 207
Matter, H. M. 31n39, 35
Mayer, B. 139n5
McKay, K. L. 157n4
McNally, R. E. 28n35
Melick, R. R. 33, 36
Mengel, B. 22n20
Metzger, B. M. 26n29, 53, 58, 66, 112, 187–88, 198
Metzner, R. 19
Meyer, H. A. W. 29–30, 35, 43, 54–55, 55n14, 56, 62, 88, 91, 101, 108, 113, 129, 136, 154, 157n4, 164n18, 167–69, 175n6, 176n8, 177, 177n9, 178, 181, 183n20, 186, 188, 195, 195n4, 196, 198,
199, 203n3, 207n8, 208–9
Michael, J. H. 35, 118, 120, 130–31
Miller, E. C., Jr. 80n1
Moda, A. 7n7
Moffatt, J. 168
Moiser, J. 181n15
Moo, D. J. 154nn9–10
Motyer, J. A. 36, 166
Moule, C. F. D. 97n6, 103n22, 110, 115
Müller, J. J. 35, 166
Müller, U. B. 7n7, 33, 36, 99n11, 145n4
Murray, J. 123, 163n15, 164n19

Nebeker, G. L. 185
Newton, M. 207n9

Oakes, P. 34, 83
O’Brien, P. T. 7n7, 32, 36, 44nn4–5, 47, 52, 54n14, 66, 74, 87, 90–91, 130, 137, 150, 153, 165–66,
178n10, 193
Oden, R. A. 67n2
Oepke, A. 114
O’Neill, J. C. 104n23
Osiek, C. 33, 36
Otto, R. 167n21
Ovenden, L. M. 26n30

Padilla, C. R. 161n12
Panikulam, G. 44, 44n5
Parker, T. H. L. 29
Pedersen, S. 88n6, 119n3, 130n16, 131, 131n17
Perkin, V. 39
Peterlin, D. 33, 142
Peterman, G. W. 34, 201n1
Pilhofer, P. 2n3, 33, 150n5
Porter, S. E. 17–18

Poythress, V. S. 101n17, 127
Preisker, H. 162n14
Price, J. D. 24n27

Räisänen, H. 161n10
Ramsay, W. M. 6n5
Reed, J. T. 13n16, 17–18, 56n16, 144n2, 153n8
Reeves, R. R. 73n7
Reumann, J. 19, 183n19, 189n26
Ridderbos, H. 84n4, 102, 148n4, 149, 154n10, 164, 164n19
Rilliet, A. 31, 34
Robertson, A. T. 76, 141, 176, 186
Roetzel, C. J. 190, 191n1
Ross, J. M. 58
Royse, J. R. 26n29
Rummel, E. 28
Russell, R. 13n16

Sanders, E. P. 160n10, 161n10
Sandnes, K. O. 181n16
Sass, M. G. 40n2
Schenk, W. 11n12, 13n16, 32, 36, 40n2, 44, 51n10, 53n13, 55, 55n15, 59n1, 66, 69, 71, 71n5, 74, 76–77, 77n10, 79, 80n1, 85, 87, 89–90, 119n3, 130, 130n15, 140, 153, 157, 157nn4–5, 159, 162,
177, 179n12, 181n15, 182, 187–88, 189n26, 195n4, 197–99, 202n2, 204n5
Schinz, W. H. 22n20
Schmithals, W. 64n1, 143, 145n4, 153, 170, 170n1, 174n5
Schnider, F. 38n1
Schreiber, S. 73n7
Schubert, P. 54n14
Schütz, J. H. 44n5, 47n9
Schweizer, E. 105n26
Silva, M. 1n1, 11nn12–13, 17–18, 22n22, 32–33, 75n9, 77, 89, 101n17, 111, 116n40, 140, 152,
153n8, 154n10, 158, 161n13, 175, 180, 197n5, 212
Smyth, H. W. 103
Souter, A. 27n32, 34
Spicq, C. 113n34
Staab, K. 27n32
Stanley, D. 179n11
Stendahl, K. 151, 151n6
Stenger, W. 38n1
Strimple, R. B. 92, 96–97, 98n9, 101n15
Swete, H. B. 34, 53
Swift, R. C. 13n16, 134–35

Tellbe, M. 146n1
Thrall, M. F. 168
Tischendorf, C. von 53, 56
Treiyer, E. 74
Trench, R. C. 57n17, 100, 132n20
Turrado, L. 35

Tyson, J. B. 170n1

Uehara, T. 26n30

Vincent, M. R. 30–31, 35, 47–48, 51, 53–54, 62–63, 66, 70, 74n8, 76–78, 89, 91, 96n4, 104, 115–16,
129, 129n14, 130–31, 136, 141, 199

Vogt, E. 131

Vollenweider, S. 73n7, 104n23

Wagner, G. 114n37

Wanamaker, C. A. 102n20, 114

Wansink, C. S. 34, 73n7

Warfield, B. B. 123n6

Watson, D. F. 18

Wegener, M. I. 19

Weiss, B. 31n38, 35, 177

Weiss, K. 207n9

Westcott, B. F. 23n24

Westerholm, S. 154n10

White, J. L. 17n18, 38n1, 59n1

Wick, P. 17

Wiesinger, A. 35

Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, U. von 73

Wiles, M. F. 27nn32–33

Williams, D. K. 18, 34, 107, 180n13

Winer, G. R. 56

Witherington, B., III 18, 19

Wong, T. Y.-C. 102n20, 104n23

Wright, N. T. 104n23

Zahn, T. 31n38

Index of Greek Words

ἀγνῶς 10n11
αἶτημα 195, 199
ἀκέραιοι 11n12, 132
ἄμεμπτος 11n12, 132, 151
ἄμωμα 11n12, 132
ἀπεκδέχομαι 184
ἀπολογία καὶ βεβαιώσει 48
ἀπόστολος 39, 40n2
ἀπρόσκοποι 51
ἄρπαγμός 10n11
αὐτάρκεια 204n6 αὐτάρκης 204

βασιλεία 189n27
βλέπω 153

γενεά 124
γνησίως 140 γνώσις 57, 168
γογγυσμῶν 123, 131

δέησις 11n12, 55, 195, 199 δέσμιος 10
διάκονος 40n2
διαλογισμῶν 123, 131 διαφέρω 58 δικαιοσύνην 160 δοκιμάζω 57n18, 58
δοῦλος 39–40, 40n2

εἰλικρινεῖς 51, 132
ἐλπίζω 140
ἐλπίς 140
ἐνάρχομαι 46n7
ἐν ἐπιγνώσει καὶ πάσῃ αἰσθήσει 50 ἐν κυρίῳ 62
ἐν Χριστῷ 62
ἐξανάστασις 10n11, 169 ἔπαινος 10n11
ἐπέχω λόγον 132 ἐπίγνωσις 57
ἐπεικές 194

ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνοις 40 ἐπίσκοπος 53
ἐπιτελέω 46, 46n7
ἐργάζομαι 118n1, 122n5 εὐαγγέλιον 44n4
εὐδοκία 66, 123
εὐρεθῶ 162, 168
εὐχαριστέω 11n12, 208
εὐχαριστία 55, 195

ζημία 157 ζημιόω 157 ζῆν 77 ζῆσαι 77

ἡγέομαι 10, 21

θυσία 129

κάγῳ 136 καρδία 195
καταλαμβάνω 11n12, 173–74
κατατομή 10n11
καταχθόνιος 10n11
κατεργάζομαι 118n1, 122n5 καυχάομαι 149
κέρδη 157 κλαίων 182
κοιλία 181n15
κύριος ἐγγύς, ὁ 198

λαμβάνω 11n12, 173
λειτουργία 129 λογίζομαι 21
λόγον 132

μεμύημαι 204, 204n5
μνεῖα 11n12
μόνον 79
μορφή 113, 115 μυέομαι 10n11

νόημα 195 νοῦς 195

οἶδα 75 οἰκτιρμοί 90–91
ὀκταήμερος 10n11
ὄνομα 110n31, 112n33

παραβολεύομαι 10n11, 142 παρακαλῶ 198
παρακλήσις 87, 90
παραμύθιον 87, 90
πεπληρωμένοι καρπὸν δικαιοσύνης 51
πέποιθα 140, 149
πίστεως Χριστοῦ 161
πολιτεύεσθε 80, 88 πολιτεύεσθε . . . στήκετε . . . συναθλοῦντες 14n17 πολίτευμα 10n11, 80, 189 πολίτευμα . . . στήκετε . . . συνήθλησαν 14n17 πρεσβύτερος 40
προενάρχομαι 46n7 προκοπή 14
προσευχή 195, 199

σάρξ 149
σκοπέω 21, 179, 187
σκύβαλα 10n11, 157–58, 181n15 σπένδομαι 128
σπλάγχνα 48, 90–91 συμμιμητής 10n11
σχῆμα 113, 115

ταπεινοφροσύνη 87, 117 ταπεινῶ 117
τέκνα 124
τελειῶ 11n12, 173

ὑπακούω 117 ὑπερυψῶ 10n11 ὑπήκοος 117 ὑστέρημα 142

φαίνεσθε 126
φρονέω 10, 187, 208

χαίρετε 144n3
χαίρω 10, 208
χαρά 10

Index of Scripture and Other Ancient Writings

Old Testament
New Testament
Old Testament Apocrypha
Old Testament Pseudepigrapha
Mishnah
Josephus
Philo
Classical Writers
Church Fathers

Old Testament

Genesis

1–3 102
1:2 LXX 45
2:2 45
29:19 LXX 56n16
29:20 LXX 56n16
32:20 LXX 56n16
35:14 130

Exodus

15:9 LXX 174n4
15:16 LXX 131
15:24 123
16 124
16:2 123
16:7–9 123
16:12 123
17:1–7 124
17:2 131
17:7 131
30:9 130
32:11–13 50
32:32–33 193

Leviticus

18:28 LXX 56n16
23:43 LXX 56n16

Deuteronomy

4:14 LXX 56n16
9:12–14 88n6
31:21 LXX 56n16
31:27 130
32:5 LXX 124, 124n7, 132
32:5 125, 130
32:20 124n7

Judges

14:11 LXX 56n16

1 Samuel

15:22 207

1 Kings

8:21 LXX 56n16

2 Kings

19:15–19 50

Job

13:13–18 LXX 70

Psalms

6:9 LXX 147
19:1–6 116
22:5 72n6
31:17 72n6
51:16–17 207
54:6 LXX 131
55:5 131
55:6 MT 131
69:28 193
148 116

Proverbs

3:9 LXX 52
11:30 LXX 52

Isaiah

1:11–20 207

14:24–27 111
19:16 LXX 131
28:16 71
41:4 45
44:6 45
45:18–25 112
45:23 LXX 111
45:23 112, 114
46:10 111
48:12–13 45
49:1–4 127n12
51:23 LXX 114n36
53:12 114
53:12 LXX 115
60:2 126
64:6 158
65:17–25 127
65:18–19 127
65:22 127
65:22–23 LXX 127n12
65:23 127

Jeremiah

1:5 64
2:17 LXX 56n16
2:19 LXX 56n16
9:23–24 76
12:15 LXX 56n16
22:16 LXX 56n16
24:7 LXX 56n16

Ezekiel

12:15 LXX 56n16
20:41 LXX 56n16
20:42 LXX 56n16
39:27 LXX 56n16

Daniel

12:1 193

Hosea

2:23 125
4:6 181
4:7 181
6:6 207
10:12 LXX 52

Amos

6:12 LXX 52

New Testament

Matthew

1:18 162n14
3:9 96
5:14–16 127
5:29 133
6:7–8 195
6:25 195
6:32 195
7:7–11 195
7:23 147
13:44–46 158
16:24–26 162
16:26 158
20:12 114
21:9 110n31
21:43 125
23:12 108
24:27 126
26:37 139
28:18 111

Mark

3:31 82n2
7:19 180, 181n15
7:27 147
8:34–35 98
8:34–37 162
9:43 133
10:17–27 152
10:28–30 98
10:45 101n18
11:25 82n2
14:33 139
15:16 65

Luke

1:6 152
1:58 133
1:78 91
2:34 64
4:38 73

7:30 111
8:37 73
9:23–25 162
9:41 124n7
11:9–13 195
12:22 195
12:30 195
12:50 73
13:27 147
24:21 168
24:51 56n16

John

1:13 122
1:14 105
3:16 111
4:23–24 148
6:41 124
6:43 124
7:17 178
8:44 82n2
11:4 131
13 105n26
13:9 130n16
15:5 123

Acts

2:21 110n31
2:38 110n31
3:6 110n31
3:16 168
4:10 110n31
4:18 110n31
4:30 110n31
5:40 110n31
5:41 84
6:1 153
7 125
8:12 110n31
8:16 110
9:27 110n31
9:28 110n31
10:48 110n31
14:22 84
15:1–5 3
15:26 110n31
16 1
16–18 39

16:1–15 2
16:16–34 2
16:18 110n31
16:19–40 85
16:35–18:22 2
18:23 2
19:5 110
19:13 110
19:17 110
20:1–2 3
20:25 78
21:13 110
21:17–19 3
21:21 148
21:27–24:27 3
22:1 48
22:3 151
23:1 80
23:6 151
23:35 65
24:16 51
24:22 65
25:10–12 3
25:14 65
25:16 48
26:5 151
26:9 110n31
27:1 3
27:12 166
28:16–31 3

Romans

1:2 148n3
1:3–4 111
1:5 47, 47n9
1:8 41, 55
1:8–10 37
1:9 48
1:10 166n20
1:11 48, 138, 141
1:13 65
1:13–15 15
1:16 71, 71n4
1:17 53, 160
1:18 44
1:24 115
1:28–32 191
2:1 193
2:12–13 168

2:13 187
2:16 39
2:17 193
2:18 50, 57
2:24 110n31
2:28–29 125, 148n3
2:29 58
3:1 9
3:1–2 158
3:2 7n7
3:3 161
3:5 9, 160
3:18 170
3:21 3, 148n3
3:21–26 160
3:22 161n13
3:23 187
3:29–31 3
3:31 148n3
4:5 109, 118, 121
4:9–16 3
4:11–12 148n3
4:12 161
4:14 104
4:22 115
5:1 187
5:2 82n3
5:3–5 70, 191
5:4 71
5:9–10 121
5:12 176, 203n4
5:18 107
5:18–19 109, 161
5:19 102, 107
6 164n17, 165
6:1 9, 78, 170
6:1–11 95, 164, 169
6:3 164
6:4 163, 164
6:5 185
6:13 51
6:15 9
6:17 56
7:5 119
7:5–11 151
7:15 113n35
7:19 113n35
7:24 184
8:2 193
8:3 106, 107n29

8:5 197
8:5–8 149
8:8–9 149
8:10–11 184
8:17 84, 98, 165
8:19 70
8:19–22 116
8:19–25 184
8:22 70
8:23 175
8:24–25 71
8:28 185
8:28–30 84
8:29 102
8:29–30 177
8:30–31 165
8:31 83
8:32 175
8:35–38 71n5
9:1–5 158
9:6 7n7, 9
9:16 122
9:19 9
9:20 193
9:25 125
9:30–31 125, 174
9:30–10:4 161n11, 162
9:32 130
9:33 71
10:3 161n11
10:11 71
10:13 110n31
11:14 166n20
11:17 193
11:20 82n3
11:22 78
11:23 78
11:25 65
12:1 149, 190, 208
12:3 47
12:4–5 193
12:8 40
12:9 191
12:13 44
12:15 182
13:11–12 184
14 181
14:4 82n2, 82n3
14:11 111
14:13 51

14:14 63
15:1 177
15:1–6 97n6
15:1–7 103
15:3 97, 105n25
15:5 96, 97, 97n6
15:7 97n6
15:8 131
15:15 47
15:16 129
15:17 76
15:22–32 59
15:23 134
15:25–26 2
15:25–32 3
15:26 44
15:26–27 3
15:27 129, 206
15:28 46, 134
16:17–18 180
16:18 179n12, 180
16:25 39

1 Corinthians

1:2 53, 110n31
1:4 55
1:4–9 52
1:5 52, 55
1:6 52
1:7 52
1:8 37, 52, 175
1:9 177
1:10 87, 110n31
1:17 105
1:17–18 107
1:23 180
1:25 40
1:26 112
1:27–28 71
1:31 76
2:3 131
3:10 47
3:15 121
3:21 76
4:4 187
4:9–13 155n2
4:16 179
4:17–19 134
4:21 130

5:1–16:12 190
5:4 110, 110n31
5:5 121
5:7 132
6:9–11 191
6:11 110n31, 168
7:29 144
7:30 182
8:1 177
8:9 51
9:1–8 60
9:1–18 201
9:3 48
9:11 207
9:15 105
9:23 47, 47n9
9:24 98
9:24–25 174
9:27 127, 166
10:1 65
10:1–13 124, 131
10:10 124
10:11 175
10:12 82n3, 131, 166
10:24 87
10:32 51
11:1 179
11:3 65
12:1 65
12:6 119
12:11 131
12:12 193
12:26 133
13:5 87
13:10 175
13:12 174
14:17 193
14:20 175
15 74n8
15:1 82n3
15:24 175
15:24–28 111, 185
15:31 76
15:36 193
15:41 102
15:42 169
15:42–44 184
15:50–54 184
15:54–58 184
15:58 127

16:1–4 2
16:3 82n2
16:8 78
16:17 78
16:17–18 142

2 Corinthians

1:1 53
1:3–7 37
1:4 54
1:8 65
1:8–11 15, 59
1:9 165
1:14 58, 76, 127
1:15–17 15
1:23 48
1:24 82n3
2:2 77
2:3 56, 185
2:11 113n35
2:13 56
2:17 130
3:4–4:6 164
3:10 158, 160n10
3:12 71, 71n4
3:18 102, 164
4:4 102
4:6 45, 163
4:10 84
4:10–12 165
4:12 119
5:2 138
5:3 168
5:4 176, 203n4
5:12 76, 113n35
5:14 73
5:17 149
6:3 51
6:7 51
6:8 197
6:12 48
6:14 51
7:1 46
7:2–16 182
7:4 71, 76
7:6–7 78
7:10 122n5
7:11 48, 56, 197
7:15 48, 131

8:1–2 196
8:1–5 3
8:4 44, 44n6
8:6 46, 46n7, 56
8:9 40, 92, 97n6, 102, 104
8:10 46n7
8:11 46
8:23 141
8:24 76
9 205
9:1–2 2
9:3 76, 105, 132
9:6 207
9:8 147
9:10 52
9:12 129
9:12–23 2
9:13 44
9:14 48, 138
10:1 194n3
10:5–6 131
10:10 78
10:17 76
11:2 197
11:7–9 2
11:8–9 201
11:9 142
11:13 153, 170
11:13–15 147
11:16–12:11 149
11:21–12:10 155n2
12:7 149
12:9 47
12:15 129
13:1–3 76, 130
13:10 76
13:11 144, 144n3

Galatians

1:6 176
1:6–9 3
1:6–10 37
1:8 132
1:8–9 9, 147
1:9 152
1:11 65
1:13 151
1:13–14 150
1:14 150

1:15 156, 176
1:15–16 64
1:20 48
2:1–16 3
2:2 127
2:4 148
2:7–9 79, 148n2
2:9 47
2:10 56, 79
2:16 161, 161n13
2:20 74
3 148
3:1 107, 180
3:1–5 3
3:3 46
3:5 76, 119n3
3:7 148
3:10 147
3:11 160
3:13 107
3:21 160
3:22 161n13
3:29 148
4 186n23
4:9 45, 148
4:11 46n8
4:18 130n16
4:19–20 166
4:20 46n8
5 186n23
5:1 82n2, 186n23, 190
5:2 190
5:2–6 2
5:3 147
5:4 46n8
5:5 46
5:7–10 3
5:10 46n8, 63
5:11 180
5:12 147, 148
5:13 79
5:13–21 8, 148
5:13–26 171
5:16–21 149
5:19 197n6
5:19–24 191
5:20 131
5:21 152, 197
5:22 51n11
5:22–23 52

5:26 91
6:1 8, 120, 132, 193
6:1–5 120
6:2 120
6:4 120
6:6 40, 44, 207
6:8 207
6:9 184, 206
6:12 107
6:12–13 3, 147, 149
6:12–14 107, 180
6:13 147
6:16 148
6:18 210

Ephesians

1:3–14 37
1:5 131
1:9 131
1:11 131
1:20 119
1:20–23 110
1:22 111
2 121
2:2 119n3
2:5 121
2:8 121
2:8–9 84n4
2:9 121
2:10 121, 147
3:20 195, 195n4
4:13 175
4:15–15 193
5:2 207
5:5 112
5:9 51, 52n11
5:20 84, 110n31
5:27 132
6:5 131
6:11 82n3
6:13 82n3
6:14 82n3
6:19 71
6:21 65
6:22 136n3

Philippians

1:1 23, 25, 53, 55, 56

1:1–2 15, 37, 38
1:1–11 15, 37
1:2 53, 124n8
1:3 24, 25, 42, 54
1:3–4 11n12, 54
1:3–5 15, 37, 41
1:3–8 15, 37, 41
1:3–11 14, 18, 44n5
1:3–26 18
1:4 24, 25, 42, 43, 49, 53, 54, 55, 57, 86
1:4–5 54
1:5 24, 25, 41, 42, 43, 44, 44n4, 44n6, 45, 47, 47n9, 54, 55, 55n15, 90, 129, 201, 209
1:5–6 208
1:6 22, 24, 32, 41, 45, 46n7, 49, 52, 53, 55, 56, 98, 120, 185
1:6–8 15, 37, 41, 45
1:7 21, 23, 24, 25, 27n34, 41, 46, 47, 47n9, 48, 53, 56, 56n16, 57, 85, 129, 188, 208
1:8 24, 25, 41, 48, 53, 57, 91, 134, 186
1:9 12, 24, 32, 49, 50, 52, 55, 57, 126, 206
1:9–11 15, 21, 37, 49, 98, 125, 126, 127, 163
1:9–12 41
1:10 24, 49, 50, 52, 53, 56, 57, 126, 132, 175
1:10–11 126
1:11 24, 25, 26, 28, 49, 52, 58, 76, 126, 127, 128n13
1:12 14, 19, 44, 59, 59n1, 61, 65, 69, 70, 75, 88
1:12–14 3, 16, 48, 61
1:12–17 16, 59, 61, 68, 138
1:12–18 59n1
1:12–26 15, 16, 17, 18, 31, 59, 60, 79, 134, 135
1:12–4:20 14
1:13 7, 61, 62, 65
1:14 25, 61, 62, 63, 65, 66, 132, 140
1:15 24, 63, 66, 87, 131
1:15–17 4, 8, 9, 16, 61, 63, 64n1
1:16 48, 64, 66, 67
1:16–17 24, 25, 64, 66
1:17 24, 25, 63, 64, 66, 67, 75, 87
1:18 24, 25, 62, 64, 69, 128, 168, 194
1:18–20 16, 68, 69, 71n4, 128
1:18–26 16, 59, 68
1:19 24, 69, 70, 71n5, 72, 76, 83, 119, 120, 134, 194
1:19–20 22, 71
1:20 24, 25, 70, 71, 72, 77, 127, 128, 181
1:21 12, 74, 77
1:21–24 16, 68, 72
1:21–26 19
1:22 24, 51n11, 73, 77, 78
1:22–26 20
1:23 24, 25, 26, 73, 73n7, 74, 77, 78
1:23–26 138
1:24 24, 26, 73, 74, 75, 75n9, 78, 141

1:24–26 79
 1:25 23, 24, 25, 53, 56, 62, 76, 78, 129
 1:25–9 75
 1:25–26 16, 59n1, 68, 69, 75
 1:25–27 134
 1:26 14, 59n1, 76, 78, 149
 1:27 11, 14n17, 15, 18, 21, 24, 25, 29, 44n4, 79, 80, 80n1, 85, 86, 88, 89, 90, 117, 119, 123, 130, 144, 183, 184, 186, 190, 191n1, 192, 196, 197
 1:27–28 8, 13, 16, 22, 79n1, 80, 81, 98
 1:27–30 4, 17, 18, 33, 164, 185
 1:27–2:4 16, 79, 80, 92
 1:27–2:8 15
 1:27–2:16 31
 1:27–2:18 15, 18, 79, 123, 134, 135
 1:27–2:30 15, 16, 79
 1:27–4:3 14, 14n17, 190n1
 1:28 24, 25, 70, 79, 82, 83, 84n4, 89, 90, 120, 194
 1:28–29 8
 1:29 27, 48, 83, 84, 90
 1:29–30 16, 80, 83, 89, 138, 165
 1:30 15, 21, 24, 85, 90, 96n5, 143, 179, 192, 198
 2 102, 121, 194
 2:1 xi, 11, 15, 23, 24, 48, 85, 87, 88, 90
 2:1–4 4, 16, 21, 50, 80, 82, 85, 86, 93, 120, 123
 2:1–11 17, 79n1, 97n6, 114
 2:1–30 18
 2:1–3:21 18
 2:2 21, 24, 85, 86, 87, 90, 91, 198, 209
 2:3 21, 24, 25, 86, 91, 103, 117, 119n3, 157
 2:3–4 87, 194, 196
 2:4 21, 24, 25, 26, 86, 91, 120, 187
 2:5 15, 16, 21, 24, 25, 94, 95, 96, 96n5, 97, 112, 113, 119, 120, 179, 182, 209
 2:5–7 114
 2:5–11 14, 16, 79, 92, 120, 155, 183, 194, 208
 2:6 21, 23, 99, 100, 101, 102, 102n20, 103, 104, 107, 113, 114, 114n36, 115, 155
 2:6–7 185
 2:6–8 11, 16, 31n38, 94, 98, 99, 108, 114, 159n7
 2:6–11 10n11, 13, 19, 20, 21, 92, 93, 95, 97, 97n6, 104n23, 105n26, 117, 144, 164, 183
 2:7 24, 40, 102, 103, 114, 115, 120, 155, 162
 2:7–8 99, 103, 104, 105
 2:8 103, 106, 107, 117, 144, 161, 184, 185n22
 2:9 24, 25, 98n9, 105n25, 108, 109, 110, 115, 141
 2:9–10 112n33
 2:9–11 16, 94, 98, 98n9, 99n11, 102, 108, 184
 2:10 99n11, 110, 115, 116
 2:10–11 111
 2:11 24, 25, 29, 99n11, 110, 111, 114, 116, 155
 2:12 15, 21, 22, 24, 70, 78, 81, 107, 117, 118, 119n3, 120, 121, 122, 127, 130, 131, 134, 136
 2:12–13 16, 33n41, 45, 117, 118, 123, 166, 205
 2:12–18 16, 17, 79, 79n1, 117

2:12–21 131n17
2:13 22, 24, 25, 27, 28, 56, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 123n6, 131
2:14 24, 120, 123, 125, 126, 131, 193
2:14–15 130, 182
2:14–16 4, 8, 16, 88n6, 98, 117, 123, 126, 127, 131
2:15 11n12, 21, 24, 25, 124, 124n7, 126, 127, 132
2:15–16 147
2:16 23, 24, 44, 58, 76, 88, 90, 126, 127, 128, 132
2:17 53, 128, 129, 131, 132, 133, 136, 140
2:17–18 16, 117, 128
2:17–30 31
2:18 86, 133, 143
2:19 15, 24, 25, 134, 135, 136, 140
2:19–22 2
2:19–24 16, 81, 135, 136
2:19–30 4, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 39, 59, 130, 134, 135, 144
2:20 137, 138, 140, 144n2
2:20–21 138
2:20–22 39, 134
2:21 24, 25, 140
2:22 137, 140
2:23 134, 135, 137, 138, 140, 141
2:23–24 140
2:24 24, 63, 129, 134, 137, 138, 140, 141
2:25 134, 135, 137, 139, 140, 141
2:25–30 16, 19, 20, 135, 138
2:26 6n6, 24, 25, 48, 134, 138, 141
2:27 24, 25, 139
2:28 134, 138, 141
2:29 124, 140, 141, 193
2:29–30 135
2:30 10n11, 24, 25, 129, 139, 140, 141, 142, 207
3 7n7, 9, 12, 13, 14n17, 15, 19, 21, 80n1, 107, 125, 143, 144, 144n2, 147, 148, 174, 181
3:1 3, 15, 18, 24, 86, 134, 143, 143n1, 144, 144n2, 145n4, 152
3:1–2 13
3:1–3 16, 146, 147
3:1–6 16, 145, 146
3:1–16 17
3:1–21 18, 31, 79n1, 144n2
3:1–4:1 14, 16, 143
3:1–4:9 18
3:2 4, 7n7, 8, 9, 10n11, 15, 82, 143n1, 144n2, 147, 152, 153, 158, 171, 172, 179, 180, 188, 194
3:2–3 125, 146
3:2–4 144n2
3:2–16 13n16
3:2–21 144n2
3:2–4:1 143
3:2–4:9 197
3:3 24, 63, 76, 148, 149, 153, 189
3:3–4 161

3:4 63, 149, 153
 3:4–6 16, 146, 149, 155
 3:4–7 144n2
 3:5 150, 152, 153
 3:5–6 150
 3:6 24, 25, 151, 152, 154
 3:7 24, 26, 144n2, 156, 157, 158, 167, 168, 169
 3:7–8 11, 16, 149, 155, 156, 158, 159, 162, 168
 3:7–9 166
 3:7–10 144
 3:7–11 13, 16, 33, 145, 150, 155, 159
 3:7–14 121
 3:8 10n11, 21, 24, 25, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 163, 167, 168, 181, 181n15, 195
 3:8–10 21, 167
 3:8–14 144n2
 3:9 29, 152, 155, 159, 160, 160n9, 160n10, 161, 162, 163, 168, 174
 3:9–11 16, 156, 159, 170, 172, 173, 175
 3:10 24, 25, 26, 53, 62, 84, 97, 155, 158, 159, 163, 164, 165, 168, 169, 174, 181, 185
 3:10–11 33n41, 166, 184
 3:10–14 98
 3:11 24, 25, 128, 155, 159, 164n18, 165, 166n20, 167, 169, 174, 176
 3:12 9, 11n12, 22, 24, 25, 26, 53, 128, 170, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 186, 187, 188, 203, 203n4
 3:12–14 16, 21, 167, 172, 173, 179, 184
 3:12–16 8, 170, 172
 3:12–4:1 16, 170, 180n14, 182n18
 3:13 21, 24, 173, 175, 176, 187
 3:13–14 90, 109, 173, 175, 176
 3:13–15 22
 3:14 24, 25, 175, 179, 182, 187
 3:15 21, 172, 175, 179, 182, 187, 188, 198, 209
 3:15–16 16, 144n2, 172, 177, 187
 3:16 24, 25, 174, 178, 188
 3:17 21, 85, 179, 183, 186, 187, 188, 198
 3:17–18 182
 3:17–19 9, 16, 172, 179
 3:17–21 17, 98
 3:18 9, 24, 81, 107, 144, 155, 182, 188, 194
 3:18–19 4, 8, 8n9, 148, 170, 171, 172, 179, 180, 183
 3:19 21, 171, 180, 181, 182, 182n17, 183, 184, 188
 3:20 10n11, 14n17, 80, 144, 182, 183, 184n21, 186, 189
 3:20–21 13, 183
 3:20–4:1 13, 16, 172, 183
 3:20–4:3 190
 3:21 24, 25, 102, 185, 189, 197
 4 12, 19, 190
 4:1 14n17, 15, 21, 22, 24, 82, 82n2, 144, 183, 185, 186, 189, 190, 190n1, 198
 4:1–3 17
 4:1–9 18, 31
 4:1–20 18
 4:2 14n17, 15, 21, 96, 97n6, 143, 144n2, 190, 196, 198, 209

4:2–3 2, 4, 16, 186, 190, 191, 192, 198
4:2–9 16, 190, 191
4:2–23 16, 190
4:3 14n17, 15, 21, 23, 24, 25, 28, 47, 82, 183, 186, 192, 193, 198
4:4 86, 143, 195
4:4–7 16, 191, 193
4:4–9 17
4:5 98, 194, 195, 196, 198, 206
4:6 4, 72, 84, 195, 199
4:6–7 195, 198, 204, 208
4:7 24, 25, 72, 195, 198, 199
4:8 10n11, 21, 180, 197, 199
4:8–9 16, 191, 196, 198
4:8–15 206
4:9 21, 96n5, 191n1, 197, 198, 199
4:10 3, 15, 21, 24, 25, 54, 59, 142, 176n7, 194, 202, 203, 203n4, 208
4:10–11 60
4:10–14 16, 202
4:10–20 12, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 33, 44, 190, 200
4:11 59, 196, 200, 204, 205
4:11–13 203, 204, 205, 208
4:12 10n11, 196, 204, 209
4:13 22, 24, 25, 59, 204, 209
4:14 47, 48, 201, 203, 206, 209
4:14–15 167
4:15 24, 28, 44, 45, 55, 132, 206, 207, 207n8, 209
4:15–16 2
4:15–20 16, 202, 205
4:16 24, 205, 208, 209
4:17 132, 142, 200, 205, 206, 209
4:17–18 207
4:18 4, 24, 59, 60, 72, 129, 140, 201, 206, 207, 208
4:19 4, 22, 24, 25, 196, 204, 208, 209
4:20 208
4:21 24, 53
4:21–23 16, 190, 210
4:23 24, 210

Colossians

1:4 55
1:7 40
1:9 57n17
1:9–11 49
1:9–12 37
1:10 147
1:15 101, 102
1:23 78
1:24 142, 165
1:24–25 84

1:29 119
2:1 65, 90
2:16–23 182
2:18–19 193
3:1 190
3:2 182, 182n17, 197
3:3–4 162
3:10 102
3:12 48, 90, 91
3:15 84, 177
3:17 110
4:7 40, 65
4:8 134, 136n3, 141
4:11 148n2
4:12 82n3
4:17 191, 192

1 Thessalonians

1:3 55
1:8 44
1:10 52n12
2:2 90
2:5 48
2:7–8 39
2:9 60, 112, 201
2:10 48
2:13 119n3
2:14 84
2:14–15 97
2:14–16 85
2:17 134
2:17–20 39
2:17–3:10 182
2:19 58, 127, 186
2:20 58, 186
3:1–10 39
3:2 47, 134
3:3 64
3:3–4 84
3:5 127
3:6 48, 138
3:7 54
3:8 82n2
4:1 144, 190
4:7 177
4:13 65
5:4–6 184
5:12 40, 191
5:13 115

5:18 84
5:23 53

2 Thessalonians

1:3 47, 55, 115
1:3–4 37
1:4–7 84
1:4–8 90
1:9–10 52n12
1:11–12 37
1:12 110, 110n31
2:7 79
2:13–14 177
2:15 82n2
3:6 110
3:7–9 179
3:14 63

1 Timothy

2:8 131
3 40
3:2–3 191
3:16 113
4:5 55
6:1 110n31
6:12 90, 177

2 Timothy

1:4 48, 138
1:12 165
2:5 82
2:8 39
2:9 61
2:11 98
2:11–12 165
2:12 84
3:2–5 191
3:17 132
4 72
4:2 81
4:6 128
4:7 90
4:9 138
4:16 48
4:17 62
4:18 72, 121

Titus

3:5 121

Philemon

4 130

4–6 37

5 55

6 44

7 43, 48

8 198

12 48, 141

15 206

17–20 39

20 48

22 134

Hebrews

1:3–4 111

1:13 185

2:6–8 185

5:7 55

5:8 107

5:14 50

6:8 47

6:9–10 47

12:1 90

12:1–2 98

12:11 51

13:15–16 207

James

3:18 51

4:8 198

5:7–11 98

5:8 198

5:10 110n31

5:14 110n31

1 Peter

2:14 58

3:15 48

3:17–22 98

4:12–13 98

4:13 84

4:14 110n31

5:2 130n16

2 Peter

1:5 55
1:5–7 191
1:10 122
3:1 51
3:14 184

1 John

2:6 97
2:28 71
3:3 184

Revelation

3:12 110n31
12:4 82n2
16:9 110n31
19:1–8 92n1
20:5–6 167n21

Old Testament Apocrypha

1 Esdras

8:58 LXX 56n16

Sirach

11:10 174n4
27:4 157
27:8 174n4
51:21 181n15

Wisdom of Solomon

7:3 114n36
15:5 65

Old Testament Pseudepigrapha

Apocalypse of Moses

31–43 73n7

Mishnah

Yebamot

4.1–2 162n14

Josephus

Against Apion

1.5 §26 187

2.23 §§190–91 101n19

Philo

On the Confusion of Tongues

17 §§77–78 88

On the Embassy to Gaius

11 §80 113n34

14 §110 101n19

Classical Writers

Appian

Civil Wars

1.97 142n7

Diodorus Siculus

Bibliotheca historica

17.73.3 174n4

Diogenes Laertius

Lives of Eminent Philosophers

7.155 132n22

Epictetus

Discourses

1.20.7 58

1.20.12 58

2.16.16 187

3.5.9 168

4.10.11–12 168

Herodotus

Historiae

9.58 174

Libanius

Fifteenth Julian Oration

34 113n34

Lucian

De dea Syria

18 67n2

Heracles

1–2 113n34

Hermotimus

77 174n4

On Sacrifices

14 113n34

Plato

Republic

2.19 = 380D 113n34

7.7 = 524C 167

Plutarch

Sulla

34 142n7

Polybius

Histories

3.8.9 91

Xenophon

Memorabilia

4.3.13 113n34

Church Fathers

1 Clement

38.2 142

51 88n6

54.4 88

2 Clement

9.10 130n16

Clement of Alexandria

Stromata

3.6.53 193

Diognetus

5.9 88

8.5 78n11

Ignatius

To the Philadelphians

5.1 72

To the Romans

2.2 128

To the Smyrnaeans

4.1 166n20

Marcionite Prologues

in toto 5n4

Polycarp

To the Philippians

3.2 12n15

Shepherd of Hermas

Similitudes

9.22.3 105n25

Notes

Introduction to Philippians

[1]. Cf. Silva 1994: ch. 6, esp. 144–47. This book, incidentally, formulates and defends several principles and methods that have played an important part in the writing of the present commentary. Rather than repeat the argumentation, I shall refer to the book when appropriate.

[2]. There have been sporadic, but completely unsuccessful, attempts at disproving the authenticity of this letter. See especially Baur 1875: ch. 5. It is sobering to see this brilliant scholar arguing with great power and erudition for a viewpoint that the vast majority of subsequent writers (including some otherwise regarded as “radical”) consider to have no foundation whatever.

[3]. For a historical discussion of Philippi, see Bakirtzis and Koester 1998. More detailed are Bormann 1995 and especially Pilhofer 1995; 2000.

[4]. The tradition in question can be traced as far back as the second century (in the Marcionite Prologues attached to Vulgate manuscripts), but the basis for that tradition cannot be ascertained.

[5]. See especially Duncan 1929: 80–82, building on Adolf Deissmann’s work. Our best estimates are that a trip between Philippi and Rome would have taken four to seven weeks (though one must also allow for the time necessary to find an adequate envoy). For the evidence, see Lightfoot (1868: 38), who argued that it probably took one month. William M. Ramsay, whose mastery of these details was second to none, wrote the article “Roads and Travels (in NT)” for HDB (5:375–402, esp. 387). According to his data, in addition to the two days required to cross the Adriatic, the trip entailed some 740 miles. Traveling on foot, a courier could be expected to cover 15–20 miles per day. At the slower rate, therefore, the trip would require a total of 52 days; at the faster rate, 39 days. One must leave open the possibility, however, that at least part of the journey might have been covered by carriage, which could halve the time. Imperial couriers averaged 50 miles per day (see OCD 1234; for additional information on the ancient postal system, see Llewelyn 1995).

[6]. Some would argue, on the basis of Phil. 2:26, that a fourth communication is required for Epaphroditus to know that the Philippians were worried about him. As several writers have pointed out, however, 2:26 may simply reflect a natural inference on Epaphroditus’s part (see now Brucker 1997: 285). If a fourth communication is thought to be necessary, we should allow for the possibility that it might have reached Epaphroditus long before he arrived in Rome.

[7]. In addition to the issues discussed here, many secondary arguments for and against the various options can be advanced. Hawthorne (1983: xxxvi–xliv) and O’Brien (1991: 19–26) can be profitably consulted for these. Note also Moda 1985, who pays special attention to the Corinthian theory set forth by Dockx 1973. In a recent and wide-ranging defense of the Ephesian theory, U. Müller (1999) contrasts Philippians with Romans (e.g., Phil. 3:2 versus Rom. 3:2; 9:6) and maintains that Paul’s argument in Phil. 3 is plausible only if this letter (like Galatians) was written prior to Romans (see esp. U. Müller 1999: 150, 171).

[8]. This view, which goes back to the eighteenth century, has been adopted by, among others, Lohmeyer and Hawthorne. For an extensive defense, see Gunther 1972: 98–107, although his discussion depends heavily on arguments from silence.

[9]. I argue at 3:18–19, however, that this passage need not be interpreted as a description of antinomianism.

[10]. In an unusual twist, Bateman 1998 proposes that all the relevant passages in Philippians refer to the same opponents but that they were local Gentiles who sympathized with Jewish rituals.

[11]. E.g., ἀγνῶς, ἐξανάστασις, ὀκταήμερος, συμμιμητής. Some significant hapax legomena are found in the christological poem of 2:6–11: ἀρπαγμός, καταχθόνιος, ὑπερυψόω. Also interesting are such terms as πολίτευμα (see comments on 3:20), μνέομαι (4:12), κατατομή (3:2), παραβολεύομαι (2:30), σκύβαλον (3:8). The word ἔπαινος is hardly a hapax, yet it appears to be used in a unique sense in 4:8.

[12]. E.g., εὐχαριστέω, μνεία, δέσεις (two times) in 1:3–4; ἄμεμπτοι, ἀκέραιοι, ἄμωμα in 2:15; λαμβάνω, καταλαμβάνω, τελειόω (passive) in 3:12. For further comments, see Silva 1994: 151–56. One of the distinctive and valuable traits of Schenk’s (1984) commentary is his recognition that “contextual synonymy” is found time and time again in the text of Philippians. We should keep in mind that ambiguity is a regular (and even necessary) feature of human language, and that the historical doctrine of biblical inspiration does not at all require us to interpret the biblical language in an unnatural way (e.g., by attributing to it artificial precision).

[13]. For a defense of this approach, see Silva 1990 (esp. introduction and ch. 6).

[14]. A partition theory for Philippians was first proposed (in a different form) early in the nineteenth century (Koperski 1993), but such an approach did not gain wide acceptance until well into the twentieth.

[15]. When writing to the Philippians in the second century, Polycarp tells them that Paul “wrote letters [ἐπιστολάς]” to them (To the Philippians 3.2). A few scholars, without success, have tried to use this passage as evidence against the integrity of Philippians. Lightfoot’s discussion (1868: 138–42) adequately deals with this question.

[16]. Since the late 1970s, many other comparable works began to appear, such as Dalton 1979, Russell 1982, and Swift 1984. And since the first edition of the present work, almost all commentaries and monographs on Philippians have taken a firm position in favor of the letter’s integrity (one striking exception is Edart 2002, who argues that Phil. 3:2–16 is a separate letter with editorial additions that may come from Luke). There are still occasional articles that argue for partition (e.g., Schenk 1994; Harnisch 1999), but many more that take the opposite viewpoint (e.g., Koperski 1992b; Black 1995; Reed 1996).

[17]. Notice the triad πολιτεύεσθε . . . στήκετε . . . συναθροῦντες in 1:27 reflected in πολίτευμα . . . στήκετε . . . συνήθησαν in 3:20; 4:1, 3. In my opinion, however, 4:2 begins a new section that consists of specific exhortations. Moreover, stressing the conceptual unity of 1:27–4:3 obscures the abruptness of chap. 3; as will be argued in the commentary, a concern to preserve the integrity of the epistle should not lead to a minimizing of this feature.

[18]. The overlap among these three disciplines (and especially between the last two) is significant. An early and helpful application of discourse analysis to the NT is Louw 1982 (esp. ch. 10). On the significance of classical Greek rhetoric for NT interpretation, see G. Kennedy 1984. For the place of the NT epistles in the context of ancient letter writing, see the survey in White 1986.

[19]. “As we lay down the Epistle to the Galatians and take up the Epistle to the Philippians, we cannot fail to be struck by the contrast. We have passed at once from the most dogmatic to the least dogmatic of the Apostle’s letters, and the transition is instructive” (from Lightfoot’s preface). See also “Exegetical History” below.

[20]. On the importance of determining the situation of the Philippian church for proper interpretation, see especially Mengel 1982, who surveys the history of research on this question (with emphasis on the work of W. H. Schinz) and relates it to the issue of the letter’s integrity.

[21]. Most contemporary commentators would dispute my theological reading of Philippians. The matter will be treated at the appropriate points in the exegesis.

[22]. Cf. Silva 1994: 147–48. I have elsewhere (Silva 1987: ch. 5) also touched briefly on some of the problems connected with the notion of contextualization.

[23]. Since text-critical discussions are of value primarily to readers familiar with the Greek language, this section dispenses with the use of transliteration.

[24]. From a narrower perspective than I am using here, Hort pointedly formulated this principle in a well-known statement: “All trustworthy restoration of corrupted texts is founded on the study of their history” (Westcott and Hort 1881: 40). That statement is contrasted with the treatment of readings or even whole documents “independently of each other” (39).

[25]. These variants were not chosen systematically according to a strict set of criteria. Some were chosen because they affect directly the exegesis of the text; others because they shed light on the general transmission of the text; still others because of their intrinsic interest. I have assumed that the reader has access to NA²⁷ (or UBS⁴) and that no useful purpose is served by trying to reproduce the information found there.

[26]. The word approximately, even in places where I do not use it explicitly, applies to most counts, since a few variations can be interpreted in more than one way. Note also that more than one variation may be included by NA²⁷ under one sign; conversely, variations listed separately may at times be closely related (so that they could be regarded as a variation unit).

[27]. Based on a particular genealogical theory, Price 1987 attempts, with the aid of a computer, to assign probabilities to each variant in Philippians.

[28]. The term “Western” simply reflects conventional use. The geographical element is misleading, while the integrity of the text-type is questioned, especially by Aland and Aland 1989: ch. 2. Even a superficial look at the textual apparatus, however, shows clearly that there is an alignment of D with F and G, less frequently with the Latin tradition.

[29]. For an excellent analysis, see Royse 1981: ch. 3. Working on the basis of the document’s singular readings, he has identified 167 instances of omissions (Royse 1981: 254–60), many of them longer than one word. On the basis of ligature forms and other scribal characteristics, Y. Kim 1988 has sought to push back the date of this document. For a response, see Metzger 1992: 265–66.

[30]. In my evaluation of the textual data I have been aided by the research of some of my previous students. H. Breidenthal, D. M. Cahill, and L. M. Oviden provided analyses of \mathfrak{P}^{46} . W. Arndt examined the text used by Origen. I was particularly helped by a very thorough analysis of the Vulgate (and related Latin witnesses) prepared by T. Uehara.

[31]. It should be clear from these introductory comments that I am not offering here a history of the interpretation of Philippians. In the first place, such a history would require the examination of numerous authors who have not necessarily written expositions of the letter but who have used it in the formulation of theology and for other purposes. Moreover, my treatment does not survey primarily the exegetical conclusions of commentators but rather their characteristic approach, their general strengths and weaknesses, and so forth. (On the related topic of “effective history” [Wirkungsgeschichte], see Bockmuehl 1995.)

[32]. For an exhaustive listing, see Biblia Patristica (1975–). Cf. also, among others, Krupp 1984 and Staab 1933 (esp. 621–30, Photius). For a very fine study of Marius Victorinus, Ambrosiaster, and Pelagius (plus Jerome and Augustine, who, however, did not comment on Philippians), see Souter 1927, although he gives relatively little attention to exegetical method. Finally, note the valuable synthesis by Wiles 1967.

[33]. Cf. the valuable discussion of Theodore and the Antiochene School in Wiles 1970.

[34]. A good illustration of this principle is the grammatical ambiguity at 1:7. The arguments in favor of the interpretation “you have me in your heart” are powerful but not conclusive. The fact that Chrysostom (along with other Greek fathers), without any apparent awareness of a difficulty, takes the clause to mean “I have you in my heart” finally swayed me to reject the alternate view—though the decision was not easy. Incidentally, though Broadus’s translation of Chrysostom in NPNF is dependable, consulting the original is essential when dealing with some of these issues.

[35]. For a very thorough study of Aquinas’s exegesis, see Domanyi 1979 (esp. chs. 4–5 on literary and historical method). For the medieval material more generally, consult McNally 1959 (esp. the fine introduction and the listing of Philippians commentaries on p. 112).

[36]. Some of the most influential works preceding that stage include the brief but incisive expositions of Bengel (1855; orig. 1742) in the eighteenth century and the early nineteenth-century commentary by van Hengel (1838), which Lightfoot valued highly.

[37]. Other important British figures include the erudite Ellicott (1865) and the more homiletical, but also scholarly, Eadie (1859).

[38]. See the exegesis of 2:6–8 below. Other important German commentators prior to Lohmeyer include B. Weiss (1859; an impressive work I regret having used in only a cursory way), Ewald (1923; for the Zahn series), Lipsius (1892), Klöpper (1893), and Dibelius (1925).

[39]. Commentaries written in other European languages have not had a significant effect on the mainstream of scholarship. We should note, however, Greijdanus's 1937 commentary, a substantive piece that regretfully I used only sporadically. Other Dutch works, written at a more popular level, are Matter 1965 and Klijn 1969.

[40]. A new edition of Hawthorne's commentary, revised by Ralph P. Martin, was published in 2004.

[41]. In several instances (e.g., on 2:12–13 and 3:10–11) my own position has been badly misrepresented (for a brief response, see new footnotes on those passages). It appears to me that other scholars have also not fared well, but they will need to speak for themselves.

[42]. I regret not having been able to consult these last two items.

I. Opening (1:1–11)

[1]. Cf. the collection by Hunt and Edgar 1932–34: 1.268–395. For a brief and clear synthesis of Greek epistolography, see Aune 1988 (esp. ch. 5 by John L. White). For a detailed study of openings and closings, see Schnider and Stenger 1987.

[2]. Contra Sass 1941 and others who emphasize the OT background of עֶבֶד יְהוָה (‘ebed yhwah, Servant of the LORD) with its nuances of divinely given authority. Schenk (1984: 77) makes the valid point that δοῦλος occupies the same lexical field as διάκονος (with ἀπόστολος being a more specific term), but that fact is not sufficient reason to set aside the sociological nuance of “slave,” much less to water down its meaning with the translation Mitarbeiter (colleague).

[3]. So Collange; similarly, Best (1968: 375) calls it “the derogatory sense of ordinary speech.”

[4]. BDAG 553 (meaning 1) translates “close relationship w. the gospel.” With regard to the force of εὐαγγέλιον, see O’Brien 1986, who argues that out of nine occurrences of this noun in Philippians, eight denote activity (nomen actionis = proclamation); the exception is the first instance of the word at 1:27, which has in view the content of the gospel message. It seems to me misleading to take the usage in 1:5 as a quasi-personification (O’Brien 1986: 217, following Gnilya 1976: 44).

[5]. Panikulam 1979: 85, following Gnilya 1976: 45. Referring to Lohmeyer but without any real basis, Schütz (1975: 49) thinks “it is contradictory to the tenor of the entire thanksgiving to tie it to this particular mundane transaction.” Peter T. O’Brien, whose monograph Introductory Thanksgivings in the Letters of Paul contains one of the finest exegetical treatments of Phil. 1:3–11, argues for a reference here to the offering, but not exclusively (O’Brien 1977: 23–25). Note also his very useful article “The Fellowship Theme in Philippians” (O’Brien 1978).

[6]. I would venture to explain the construction in Phil. 1:5 as an ellipsis for ἐπὶ τῇ κοινωνίᾳ ὑμῶν τῆς διακονίας τῆς εἰς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, in conformity with 2 Cor. 8:4.

[7]. The 2 Corinthians passage is particularly intriguing because there Paul twice (vv. 6 and 10) contrasts ἐπιτελέω with προενάρχομαι (Phil. 1:6 uses ἐνάρχομαι).

[8]. Because that evidence was frighteningly small in the case of the Galatians, Paul would not presume on the genuineness of their faith so as to exclude the possibility of their perdition (Gal. 4:11, 20; 5:4). Even in that setting, however, the apostle could express confidence that his readers would respond appropriately (5:10).

[9]. The connection with verse 5 was stressed by Theodore, who also interprets χάρις with reference to Rom. 1:5. His resulting understanding of the verse, however, is different from the one presented here. In his commentary on 1 Corinthians, Fee (1987: 432n56) gives Phil. 1:7 as evidence that Paul in 1 Cor. 9:23 means the benefits rather than the work of the gospel, but in his Philippians commentary he does not refer to this parallel. Note also Schütz 1975: 52.

[10]. Martin (1976: 70) suggests an exegetical force (“fruit which consists of being rightly related to God”), but that makes poor sense. Schenk (1984: 122) argues that δικαιοσύνης is an authorial genitive, therefore equivalent to διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.

[11]. The important difference is that in these occurrences the noun in the genitive is of quite a different character from δικαιοσύνη. In Phil. 1:22 it is ἔργου; in Gal. 5:22 it is a personal agent, πνεύματος; Eph. 5:9, φωτός, is closer, but an important textual variant is πνεύματος.

[12]. The parallel prayer in Colossians makes no explicit reference to the Lord’s return, but note the prominent role this theme plays in 1 Thess. 1:10 and 2 Thess. 1:9–10.

[13]. H. Beyer, incidentally, greatly overstates the point when he describes this view as “not grammatically possible” (TDNT 2:616n26). Schenk (1984: 78–80), who gives an unnecessarily involved discussion of σύν (whether it is inclusive or additive), regards the phrase as a non-Pauline interpolation.

[14]. For a detailed argument in favor of the causal interpretation, see O’Brien 1977: 41–46 (building on the work of Schubert 1939). O’Brien (1977: 43) tells us he has not found one instance (in or outside the NT) where εὐχαριστῶ ἐπὶ has a temporal force (for a reaffirmation and further defense of his view, see now O’Brien 1991: 59–61; against it, Fee 1995: 78–80 and Bockmuehl 1998: 58). Strictly speaking, however, it would be imprecise to describe the use even here as temporal (note my quotation marks above). The preposition ἐπὶ probably preserves its “local” sense. It is simply that the idea conveyed by the whole is naturally translated with a temporal English clause. Incidentally, because of the position of the article (cf. BDF §275.3), Meyer argues for the following sense: “my remembrance of you in its entire tenor and compass is mingled with thankfulness towards God” (similarly most commentators). I view this approach as an instance of overinterpretation and would suggest that Paul uses this construction here primarily because it lends some emphasis to his statement.

[15]. Indeed, Schenk (1984: 91–92, stressing the verbal similarity with 4:6) argues that Paul intends a substantive connection, not just a pun, between εὐχαριστῶ and χαρά: “The prayer of thanks is an expression of joy to God for what he has done” (nevertheless, Schenk affirms that δέησις = intercession). Kent (1978: 107) goes too far, however, in construing verse 5 with μετὰ χαρᾶς; this connection is grammatically inexact, though it usefully calls attention to the emphatic position of the phrase. For the LXX background to the semantic field of prayer, see Cimosi 1985.

[16]. In a thorough study, Reed (1991) examined over 90 NT instances of two substantives with the infinitive and found that in the vast majority of these, the subject preceded the object. There is special value, however, in examining passages that correspond more closely with Paul’s use in Phil. 1:7. Accordingly, I used BibleWorks to do a search (LXX and NT) of the infinitive followed immediately by an accusative personal pronoun and followed within five words by a second accusative personal pronoun. After setting aside instances where the second accusative was ruled by a different verb or a preposition, I was left with 21 passages (in addition to Phil. 1:7): Gen. 29:19, 20; 32:20; Lev. 18:28; 23:43; *Deut. 4:14; 31:21; Judg. (A) 14:11; 1 Kings 8:21; *1 Esdr. 8:58; Jer. 2:17, 19; 12:15; 22:16; 24:7; Ezek. 12:15; 20:41, 42; 39:27a, 27b; Luke 24:51. Remarkably, the pronoun closest to the infinitive (or, if we prefer, the one that occurs first) functions as the subject in every instance except for the two asterisked passages above, and in both of these the object is impersonal. Surely one would need unusually strong evidence to interpret Phil. 1:7 in a way that is contrary to this pattern.

[17]. Such a rendering could be supported by an appeal to the arguments of Trench (1880: 285) and Lightfoot (1879: 138, on Col. 1:9).

[18]. Both terms are examples of a common kind of metonymy. English prove, which earlier meant “try, test,” provides a close parallel to δοκιμάζω; similarly, the verb distinguish leads to the commendatory adjective distinguished.

II. Paul's Missionary Report (1:12–26)

[1]. See White 1972: 2–3 regarding the so-called disclosure formula, and White 1972: 73 for his view that the body-opening in Philippians covers 1:12–18. That this paragraph extends to verse 26 seems much preferable. Schenk (1984: 129), for example, points out that προκοπή and the first person pronoun in verses 12 and 25–26 provide the frame for the passage.

A. Paul's Circumstances (1:12–17)

[1]. So Hawthorne, who provides a brief but useful survey of the various interpretations that have been set forth. Chrysostom, incidentally, believed that Paul was referring to unbelievers who evangelized “in order that the Emperor’s wrath might be increased at the spread of the Gospel, and all his anger might fall on the head of Paul” (perhaps this is also Calvin’s point). This explanation is simply unsatisfying, however. Schmithals (1972: 74–75n45) sees verses 15–17 as parenthetical and referring to the situation in Philippi. Perhaps there is a small (but suggestive) measure of truth in this proposal.

[2]. As in Lucian’s De dea Syria 18, “Do not, then, out of spite bring grief [πένθος ἐγείραι] to the whole kingdom” (see Attridge and Oden 1976: 27).

B. Paul's Attitude (1:18–26)

[1]. τί γάρ: the causal use of γάρ gives way to the transitional, so that this phrase is roughly equivalent to τί οὖν (what therefore?).

[2]. For a helpful discussion, see Hays 1989: 21–24.

[3]. Hawthorne (1983: 41) attempts an explanation, but I do not find it persuasive.

[4]. Hawthorne points to Rom. 1:16 and 2 Cor. 3:12 and argues that here in Philippians Paul was expressing his commitment not to be ashamed of the gospel; even a Roman tribunal would not embarrass him but rather provide a platform for bold testimony (this is Hawthorne’s strongest argument for his reading of Phil. 1:18–20).

[5]. Cf. Funk 1967: 262n1. Schenk (1984: 145–46), who suggests that Rom. 8:35–38 provides a close parallel to Phil. 1:19, argues against a false dichotomy between present acquittal and eschatological fulfillment.

[6]. In Ps. 22:5, for example, the phrase “they were not ashamed (or disappointed)” becomes equivalent to “they were saved”; in Ps. 31:17 “being put to shame” is equated with “lying silent in the grave.”

[7]. According to Vollenweider 1994, Paul’s language in this passage reflects traditional concepts in the ancient world. For the view that the background should be seen in Apoc. Mos. 31–43, see Schreiber 2003, who also emphasizes the provocative nature of v. 23. Cf. Holloway 2001: 53: “Paul unambiguously complains that the Philippians are preventing him from choosing the option he much prefers. . . . Like the gospel, the Philippians should be making progress despite Paul’s imprisonment, and like Paul, they should be rejoicing. But they are not, and their failure to do so works a burden on Paul.” See further Wansink 1996 (esp. ch. 2) for a discussion of this passage as indicating a voluntary choice, and Jaquette 1994 for the possibility that it contains allusions to suicide. Croy 2003 also discusses the question of suicide but argues that Paul is using the rhetorical trope of “feigned perplexity” so that the means of his death becomes less relevant. Finally, Reeves 1992 speculates that the Philippians intended their gift to buy Paul’s freedom, that the apostle was unwilling to use it for that purpose (he expected God to deliver him), and that therefore he had to explain the reason for his strange choice.

[8]. We are not concerned here with the controversy about whether or not this passage contradicts, or marks theological development from, Paul’s views on death as contained in 1 Cor. 15. To my mind, the supposed discrepancy is a pseudo-difficulty that deserves little attention (cf. Vincent).

[9]. I have argued this point elsewhere (Silva 1980). If, with Lightfoot, we construe τοῦτο with οἶδα, then the construction becomes even more emphatic, for πεποιθώς would have to be understood adverbially (“I know with confidence”) and as referring to the content of verse 25 rather than verse 24.

[10]. See BDF §442.7–8. Schenk (1984: 160) stresses the possible Semitic background of this syntax and proceeds, with no substantive grounds, to explain subsequent instances of καί in this passage in the same way.

[11]. Even in the case of Diogn. 8.5, Goodspeed 1950: 280 renders, “No man has ever seen him or discovered him, but he has revealed himself” (italics added).

III. A Call to Sanctification (1:27–2:30)

[1]. Brucker (1997: 295) suggests that the three verbal phrases in Phil. 1:27b–28a (stand firm, contending, not frightened), which as part of the propositio define what it means to live worthy of the gospel, announce the threefold structure of what follows (respectively, 2:1–11; 2:12–18; 3:1–21).

A. Christian Citizenship (1:27–2:4)

[1]. Similarly, Hendriksen (1962: 80–81) argues against the extreme alternatives of Brewer (1954), who sees here a command to discharge civic obligations, and of Lenski (1937: 755–56), who sees no reference to citizenship at all. Schenk (1984: 167) believes that the use of this verb, as opposed to περιπατέω, is motivated by Paul’s concern with the social aspect of the conduct he enjoins here. Miller (1982) claims that the verb had a special nuance in Judaism (to live according to the Torah), that Paul uses it here as part of his ecclesiology (the church as the true Israel), and that this use supports the integrity of the letter (1:27 anticipates chap. 3). While some of Miller’s references are suggestive, he assumes that the verb must take on the sense conveyed by its modifiers. At any rate, his thesis greatly overloads the verb.

[2]. Rom. 14:4; 1 Cor. 16:3; Gal. 5:1; Phil. 4:1; 1 Thess. 3:8; 2 Thess. 2:15; elsewhere in Mark 3:31; 11:25; John 8:44 (v.l.); Rev. 12:4. See Grundmann’s useful summary in TDNT 7:636–38.

[3]. See esp. Rom. 5:2; 11:20; 14:4 (both forms); 1 Cor. 10:12; 15:1; 2 Cor. 1:24; Eph. 6:11, 13, 14; Col. 4:12. For the possible metaphor of soldiers who persist in guarding their posts, cf. Lohmeyer.

[4]. That faith is both a necessity and a gift is suggested by the whole thrust of Eph. 2:8–9, even though πίστεως is not the grammatical antecedent of τοῦτο (cf. the discussion in Ridderbos 1975: 234n). Notice also the striking parallelism between the language there (καὶ τοῦτο οὐκ ἐξ ὑμῶν, θεοῦ τὸ δῶρον) and in Phil. 1:28 (καὶ τοῦτο ἀπὸ θεοῦ). One ought to be careful, incidentally, not to draw the wrong conclusions from what Paul says about suffering as a divine gift. Suffering is not in itself a good thing but an evil characteristic of this sinful world (and certainly we must not think of evil, in the sense of sin, as proceeding from God). Believers certainly are not admonished to thank God for experiencing personal tragedy. But we may, indeed we must, thank him that he does not isolate us from evil experiences; we are to praise him that in his wisdom he uses them to strengthen us and thus to accomplish his saving purposes in us.

[5]. For a very similar yet independent arrangement, see Black 1985. Fee (1995: 177n15) strongly rejects the possibility of a strophic scheme, but he draws too sharp a dichotomy between “conscious literary production” and “the oral nature of the text.”

[6]. Translations from LCL (Philo, 4:51–53; Apostolic Fathers, 2:361; 1:101). The reference in 1 Clement is emphasized by Pedersen (1978: 6), who links that passage with chap. 51 and sees an allusion to Moses’s example (cf. Deut. 9:12–14). See also comments on 2:14–16.

B. Christian Humility (2:5–11)

[1]. Caird (1976: 104) had already made this point forcefully in his commentary: “The meaning of this passage in Philippians is the meaning Paul intends it to have, the meaning he has imposed on the ambiguities of its language. . . . There may be some justification for [isolating this passage from its context] when we are speculating about early Christian origins, but not when we are expounding a letter of Paul.” It is refreshing to note the growing number of recent publications that recognize this principle. (See, e.g., Black 1988. For a strong argument that the passage should be understood as “exalted Pauline prose,” see Fee 1992. Note also Kennel 1995, a detailed monograph that examines this passage along with the Magnificat and Rev. 19:1–8, concluding on linguistic grounds that they do not belong to a distinct Gattung.)

[2]. Cf. Feinberg 1980: 24–27. The character of this problem is most clearly reflected in Morna D. Hooker’s oft-quoted remark, “I myself have produced six or seven different analyses—and found each of them convincing at the time!” (Hooker 1975: 157). Since the first edition of the present commentary, not a few new proposals have been made. Among those worthy of note, see Gundry 1994, who finds a concentric semantic structure of twelve (irregular) lines grouped into five sections that form a chiasm, with a number of additional smaller chiasms.

[3]. Supplying φρονεῖν δεῖ (cf. also Gnika 1976: 109, φρονεῖν τρέπει). Other possibilities are: “Let your bearing towards one another arise out of your life in Christ Jesus” (so NEB); “Have the same thoughts among yourselves as you have in your communion with Christ Jesus” (C. H. Dodd, quoted in BDAG 1066, s.v. φρονέω, meaning 3).

[4]. Cf. esp. Vincent. Hawthorne in fact places so much weight on “the clear parallel nature of the two halves of this sentence” (1983: 81) that he is led to accept the reading of the Majority text and then to supply a passive verb in the second half: τοῦτο φρονείσθω ἐν ὑμῖν ὃ καὶ [ἐφρονεῖτο] ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ (let this be thought by you that was also thought by Christ Jesus). Surely this is a counsel of despair, since Hawthorne himself acknowledges that the variant φρονείσθω appears to be “an effort to explain more easily” the two clauses as parallel (76).

[5]. If one were to follow the traditional interpretation of verse 5, it would be least objectionable to supply the verb βλέπετε, “which you also see in Christ Jesus,” a suggestion made by Lohmeyer on the basis of Phil. 1:30; 4:9; T. Sim. 4.5. Heriban (1983: 89–90) appeals to the Greek fathers in support of the individual sense of ἐν ὑμῖν, but they did not address this issue directly. The fact that they adopted the ethical interpretation does not really tell us how they understood the grammar (besides, they worked under the assumption that the text read φρονείσθω).

[6]. Moule (1970: 265–66) appeals to Phil. 4:2 and Rom. 15:5 in support of the traditional translation, but the logic of his argument is not at all clear. Heriban (1983: 108–10) has a very full and instructive discussion of the parallels between Phil. 2:1–11 and Rom. 15:1–6, yet he ignores the relevance of ἐν ἀλλήλοις for our understanding of ἐν ὑμῖν. Remarkably, Martin (1976: 93) dismisses Rom. 15:7 and 2 Cor. 8:9 because they “are short statements, not comparable with an extended passage such as verses 6–11 in our letter.”

[7]. Fee (1995: 199–201) rejects this interpretation, arguing that those who adopt it “almost to a person fail to come to terms with” τοῦτο (which he believes points backward) and that it “seems much too subtle for a basically oral culture” (see his notes 25 and 33). In response, it should be noted, first, that the interpretation defended above does not preclude taking the preposition as pointing backward (and in any case the construction τοῦτο . . . ὃ is uncommon, not precisely paralleled elsewhere in Paul); and second, that oral cultures, precisely because they are oral and not used to the written form, can more easily than others process subtleties and complexities through their hearing (one can point to dozens of Pauline passages that “seem” to be beyond oral comprehension). At any rate, it is baffling that Fee, in his discussion, makes almost no effort to address the very significant objections that have been raised against the traditional interpretation and thus provides a superficial treatment of this issue (a similar criticism can be made of Bockmuehl 1998: 122–24).

[8]. See also Heriban 1983: 104, and the comment by Hurtado (1984: 121): “However we translate the somewhat elliptical ho kai en Christō Iēsou, the following verses determine more fully the interpretation to be given to the passage as a whole.”

[9]. Elsewhere Martin (1997: xiii) faults Strimple (1978–79) for not dealing in detail with verses 9–11: “In my judgment, this is a fatal deficiency.” These words, plus his further statements (1997: xiv–xv), indicate how much weight Martin gives to this objection. Contrast Calvin’s comments on verse 9: “By adding consolation, he shows that abasement . . . is in the highest degree desirable. . . . Who will now refuse submission, by which he will ascend into the glory of the heavenly Kingdom?”

[10]. Martin (1997: xxxviii) speculates that the sectarian teachers in Philippi had used the Christ-hymn to introduce a theologia gloriae that is in fact far removed from “true Christian living.” Hurtado (1984) is one of many scholars critical of Käsemann’s attack on the ethical interpretation; he perceptively suggests that this attack may have been an overreaction to nineteenth-century liberalism.

[11]. So Jeremias (1963: 186; cf. also U. Müller 1988: 19). To make verses 9–11 fit the pattern, however, Jeremias needs to get rid of the last five words in verse 10 and the last four in verse 11. If Paul was so insensitive as to disrupt the poetic structure of the hymn by adding so much material, it would seem that Jeremias’s structuring tells us very little about how the apostle himself understood the poem. Comparable to Jeremias’s proposal is that of Grelot (1973a) in an article that includes a retroversion into Aramaic. For a better retroversion (which seems to support Lohmeyer’s arrangement), see Fitzmyer 1988.

[12]. “One may possess a form, type, or attitude; but one is not spatially ‘in it,’ as it were. [For Paul, ἐν] designates the realm in which one stands and by which one is determined, as in a field of force” (Käsemann 1968: 61).

[13]. See esp. Georgi (1964: 264): “Es lässt sich sogar noch deutlicher zeigen, dass diese Form des gnostischen Mythos bei der Entstehung unseres Textes überhaupt nicht Pate gestanden haben kann.”

[14]. Käsemann 1968: 62. He adds: “Here we also come upon the main argument for my contention that, whether or not one chooses to differentiate between ‘divine form’ and ‘equality with God,’ both terms are at least co-ordinated with one another. . . . Whoever overlooks this fact and separates these two terms in order to consider them in isolation, can hardly be credited with a methodologically sound procedure.”

[15]. So Strimple 1978–79: 260; cf. H. Kennedy 1897–1910: 435–36; Heriban 1983: 245; and others.

[16]. For a survey of the arguments, see Martin 1997: 106–19; note also S. Kim 1982: 193–205; and most recently Hooker 2000.

[17]. Cf. Silva 1994: 77. Heriban (1983: 213–14n17, following Dibelius) shows the difficulties of taking the terms in a rigorous technical sense. Cf. also Poythress (1987: 74–79) on the differences between biblical language and technical theological terms; and Frame 1987: 222–26.

[18]. Binder (1987) seeks to understand δοῦλος in the light of Mark 10:45.

[19]. Philo, for example, ridicules Gaius’s claims to divinity by stating that the θεοῦ μορφή “cannot be counterfeited as a coin can be” (Gaius 14 §110 [LCL 10:55]); and Josephus, in speaking of God’s uniqueness, links μορφή and μέγεθος (greatness) as qualities that cannot be described or visually represented (Ag. Ap. 2.23 §§190–91 [LCL 1:369]). Bockmuehl (1997), appealing to Jewish mystical traditions, concludes that “the form of God” is a reference to Jesus’s preincarnate but visible manifestation of divine beauty.

[20]. Wanamaker (1987) argues that those who deny the theme of preexistence by means of the Adamic interpretation cannot account for the contrast between being in the form of God and taking the form of a slave. Unfortunately, a very weak treatment of verse 6b–c leads him to deny that the passage teaches the absolute divinity of Christ. Preexistence plus divinity is strongly argued by Hurst (1986) and Wong (1986).

[21]. An active meaning (“the act of snatching, robbery”) is the usage found in the few attested occurrences of the word outside the NT and Christian writers; a passive meaning (“the thing possessed or to be snatched”) is attested only in the form ἄρπᾱγμα.

[22]. The paraphrases above come, respectively, from Hawthorne (quoting Moule), Foerster (TDNT 1:474), Lightfoot, and H. Kennedy (1897–1910: 437). Note that each of these interpretations is given a variety of twists by different writers (cf. Martin 1997: 134–64).

[23]. The basic soundness of Hoover’s research is accepted by, among others, Heriban (1983: 262–65), Wright (1986), and most recent commentators. Wong (1986: 277–78) rejects Hoover’s conclusions, but on very weak grounds. More substantial, though still unpersuasive, are the criticisms formulated by O’Neill (1988) and Vollenweider (1999). The latter offers some important evidence from the Greco-Roman world regarding the usurpation of divine equality by kings. While this material may have some relevance for our understanding of Phil. 2:6–11 (Christ’s humility contrasts dramatically with the hubris of earthly rulers), it hardly follows that, in Paul’s thought, Christ’s claiming equality with God would have belonged in the category of usurping what did not rightfully belong to him.

[24]. Italics added (the word speculative need not have a negative nuance, however); cf. also Heriban 1983: 286.

[25]. Apparently, this is the way the author of The Shepherd of Hermas understood the Christ-hymn, for in describing believers who please themselves (ἐαυτοῖς ἀρέσκοντες, cf. Rom. 15:3 again) he says: “for this high-mindedness [ὕψηλοφροσύνην; contrast ταπεινοφροσύνη] therefore many have been made worthless [ἐκενώθησαν] by exalting themselves [ὑψοῦντες ἑαυτοῦς; cf. Phil. 2:9, ὑπερύψωσεν]” (Herm. Sim. 9.22.3 [LCL 2:275]).

[26]. Such a formulation is reminiscent of the Johannine perspective (note esp. Dodd 1953: 247–48). Not surprisingly, some scholars appeal to John 13 in their interpretation of Phil. 2:6–11 (e.g., Hawthorne, Heriban). For a connection with the Synoptic Gospels, cf. Schweizer 1985.

[27]. It is important to keep in mind that the aorist and the present in the dependent moods do not of themselves have deictic temporal reference (i.e., indicating past or present). Because the aorist presents the action as a whole or complete, however, it is only natural (but not necessary) for the aorist participle to refer to an action that is antecedent to that of the main verb. Similarly, the present participle, which presents the action as in progress (not to be confused with “continuous” or “repetitive”), almost always refers to action contemporaneous with that of the main verb.

[28]. The participle itself, γενόμενος, is also in the aorist tense, but it cannot possibly refer to antecedent action (the translation would yield no reasonable sense: “he humbled himself after he had become obedient to death”). This fact confirms the usual handling of the other participles as referring to simultaneous action.

[29]. Cf. the parallel use of ὁμοίωμα in Rom. 8:3, a passage where the thought of sacrifice is predominant. In contrast to my exposition, Martin (1976: 100) argues that “no soteriology . . . is implied.”

[30]. Certainly LSJ does not give such an equivalent; BDAG (714 [1.d.δ]) does, but its treatment of the material is unclear.

[31]. The phrases ὄνομα θεοῦ (Rom. 2:24; 10:13; 1 Tim. 6:1; Rev. 3:12; 16:9), ὄνομα κυρίου (Matt. 21:9 and parallels; Acts 2:21; 15:26; 1 Cor. 1:2, 10; 5:4; 6:11; Eph. 5:20; 2 Thess. 1:12; James 5:10, 14), ὄνομα Ἰησοῦ (Acts 4:18, 30; 5:40; 9:27, 28; 26:9), ὄνομα Χριστοῦ (1 Pet. 4:14), and ὄνομα Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (Acts 2:38; 3:6; 4:10; 8:12; 10:48; 16:18) never indicate the possession of a name other than the one given in the genitive case.

[32]. Hawthorne without good reason denies the eschatological element here. With regard to George Howard’s view that the passage has in view Jesus’s resurrection rather than his enthronement, see Heriban 1983: 329–31.

[33]. It is not my position that ὄνομα in Phil. 2:9–10 is a direct reference to Yahweh, as a few scholars have argued with some persuasiveness. I would prefer to speak about that reference as a necessary implication of Paul’s teaching that the granting of the name serves as the basis on which worship takes place.

[34]. The references are, respectively, to Plato, Republic 2.19 = 380D (LCL 1:189); Xenophon, Memorabilia 4.3.13 (LCL 305); Philo, Gaius 11 §80 (LCL 10:41); Lucian, On Sacrifices 14 (LCL 3:171) and Heracles 1–2 (LCL 1:63); Libanius, Fifteenth Julian Oration 34 (LCL 1:169). I owe the last three references to my former student Roy Kotanski; the first two are listed by BDAG 659. For more linguistic references, see Spicq 1978–82: 2.568–73.

[35]. Carmignac (1971–72: 140) points out that in 204 instances (against four, namely, 2 Cor. 2:11; 5:12; Rom. 7:15, 19) the particle negates what immediately follows, but note the criticisms of Grelot (1973b: 35), who rightly explains the position of οὐχ as emphatic negation. Carmignac (1971–72: 142) also appeals to Chrysostom in support of his view, but the evidence is not as clear as he makes it out to be; indeed, his treatment of the relevant passage is misleading. In any case, his resulting translation, “Il a estimé que ce n’était pas une usurpation d’être égal à Dieu,” has not proved attractive to most scholars, with the notable exception of Hooker (1975).

[36]. Interestingly, Grelot (1972) believes that equality of nature is in fact expressed in this passage, but by the previous clause, verse 6a, not verse 6c. Rather disappointing is his method (1972: 500) of establishing an equivalence between ἴσα and Hebrew k- on the basis of Isa. 51:23 LXX (a paraphrastic rendering that really means “equal in level with the ground”) and several references in LXX Job (with further appeal to the Qumran Targum of Job!). For some reason neither he nor other writers have referred to passages where the sense of equality seems strong (e.g., Wis. 7:3).

[37]. For an extensive and detailed argument in favor of direct dependence (based on vocabulary, structure, and theology), see now Manzi 1999. It needs to be stressed, however, that the notion of direct influence is totally compatible with that of deliberate allusion (but still distinct from the kind of explicit reference that some scholars see here). For a formulation similar to mine, see Heriban 1983: 160–62, who argues that the Isaianic passage provides the thematic background of humiliation and exaltation, and as such it is significant (cf. also Wagner 1986).

[38]. A helpful summary, including well-selected bibliographies, may be found in NIDNTT 1:703–14; 2:44–52, 284–93, 496–508.

[39]. The least objectionable classification is spirits in heaven, men on earth, and the dead in Sheol (cf. Heriban 1983: 350–51; and the fuller discussion in Hofius 1991: ch. 2).

[40]. If so, this may be an instructive example of a change that cannot be neatly categorized as either deliberate or accidental but as occupying a psychological area where the two overlap (cf. Silva 1985: 161–62).

C. Christian Obedience (2:12–18)

[1]. It would be grasping at a straw to attempt a solution to this problem by driving a wedge between the compounded form κατεργάζομαι and the simple ἐργάζομαι, as though the former referred to what we may legitimately do and the latter to what God alone does. See below for further comments on these verbs.

[2]. In light of my strong language here (an emphasis reiterated below), it is very difficult to understand how Fee (1995: 235n23) can regard it as only “an occasional demurrer” on my part and proceed to characterize my view as “a case of ‘either/or’ (i.e. either individual or community).” The conviction that Paul considers the matter as “both/and” not only plays an obvious role in my argument but is in fact fundamental to it.

[3]. Eph. 2:2 and 1 Thess. 2:13 are ambiguous; the rendering “among” is preferable in Gal. 3:5. In a very fine article, Pedersen (1978: 29n74) prefers the collective interpretation of the phrase but wisely remarks that, because Paul does not separate the collective from the individual, the question is irrelevant. Even less relevant is the force of ἐαυτῶν in verse 12, a reflexive pronoun which, claims Schenk (1984: 217), always emphasizes cooperation. In fact, the parallel to which he appeals for support (v. 3) undermines his point because there τὰ ἐαυτῶν refers to one’s own interests as opposed to those of others. The translation “your own salvation” for verse 12 is quite proper, though I would not argue against such a rendering as “your common salvation,” since there is no denying that Paul has the community, not isolated individuals, in mind.

[4]. The word tension can be very misleading, particularly if it is thought to reflect an element of irrationality. There is certainly no question here of finding antinomies in God’s revelation, but merely of recognizing that in our finiteness and sin we are often unable to assimilate that revelation fully and thus feel as though we are being pulled in different directions.

[5]. Οὐκ εἶπεν, Ἐργάζεσθε, ἀλλὰ Κατεργάζεσθε, τουτέστι, μετὰ πολλῆς τῆς σπουδῆς, μετὰ πολλῆς τῆς ἐπιμελείας. The juxtaposition of ἐργάζομαι and κατεργάζομαι in 2 Cor. 7:10 could be an instance of semantic neutralization, though Hughes (1962: 272n12) may be right in explaining the latter as emphatic.

[6]. Note also the fine discussions in Eadie 1859: 135–38 and Warfield 1932: 363–64. Aquinas (1969: 88), interestingly and helpfully, argues that verse 13 excludes four errors: (1) that man can be saved without God’s help; (2) that free will is annulled by fate; (3) that whereas the accomplishing comes from God, the choice (the willing) comes from us; and (4) that what God accomplishes he does through our merits. This last error, he adds, is excluded by the expression “for the good pleasure,” because “before we get God’s grace there is no good merit in us.”

[7]. Phil. 2:15: τέκνα θεοῦ ἄμωμα μέσον γενεᾶς σκολιᾶς καὶ διεστραμμένης. Deut. 32:5: τέκνα μώμετα γενεᾶ σκολιᾶ καὶ διεστραμμένη. (Cf. also Deut. 32:20 and Luke 9:41.) Curiously, Chrysostom sees some significance in the lack of an explicit reference to the Israelites such as we find in Paul’s words to the Corinthians (the latter, he thinks, needed a sharper rebuke).

[8]. And does the unusual reference in 1:2 to “overseers and deacons” have anything to do with this possible problem? It should be pointed out that Bonnard (1950: 51), even though possibly correct in suggesting that insubordination is the problem in view, falsely excludes the Godward reference (cf. also Hawthorne). Gnllka (1976: 151) appreciates this latter, “theological” sense, but he implies that the Philippians are guilty of complaining directly against God.

[9]. ἡμάρτοσαν οὐκ αὐτῷ τέκνα μώμετα. The significance of anti-Judaic polemic in the Christian use of the OT is stressed by Harris (1925–26: 8).

[10]. Bockmuehl (1998: 157) considers this inference “far-fetched,” but on the questionable grounds that it cannot be the meaning of the LXX and that Philippians does not contain explicit references to the OT.

[11]. The second clause is a participial construction that should be understood as either epexegetical (that is, explanatory of, and therefore equivalent to, the first clause) or instrumental (“you appear as lights by holding fast the word”). The difference between these two is not substantive. Lightfoot takes the first clause as parenthetical and construes ἐπέχοντες with γένησθε, but such a move seems quite unnecessary.

[12]. Isa. 65:22b–23a LXX: τὰ ἔργα τῶν πόνων αὐτῶν παλαιώσουσιν. οἱ δὲ ἐκλεκτοί μου οὐ κοπιάσουσιν εἰς κενόν. . . . Cf. also 49:1–4.

[13]. This thought may be present even in 1:11, if Ɑ⁴⁶ gives us the original reading—see the additional note on that verse.

[14]. The latter view was propounded by Lightfoot, and Vincent strongly defended it: if the ungodly generation should put Paul to death, his “blood would be the libation which would be added to the Philippians’ offering.”

[15]. This suggestion has been picked up by several German scholars (including Haupt 1902: 103; Gnllka 1976: 154; Schenk 1984: 225) but completely ignored by English commentaries and versions. Chrysostom possibly understood the connection in the same way (the lemma begins with ἐπί), but his comments are ambiguous with respect to the syntax. Indeed, he links χαίρω with σπένδομαι and συγχαίρω with θυσία!

[16]. Pedersen (1978: 4–5) states, without providing sufficient evidence, that such a connection is philologically improbable. All of his references (John 13:9; Gal. 4:18; 1 Pet. 5:2; 2 Clem. 9.10) contain a nonfinite verb in the background.

[17]. Pedersen 1978: 17–21, esp. p. 21 on Phil. 2:12–21 (however, Pedersen denies on p. 23 that Paul’s words are a warning against a false sense of security). It is not clear how Hawthorne can appeal to this article in support of his sociological understanding of the phrase.

[18]. Alford's comments were written to refute the view that this phrase begins a new sentence; such a construction has been adopted sporadically and has little to commend it.

[19]. The Latin versions have sitis and this rendering is thought by some to reflect the Greek ἡ̃τε, but one must allow for the possibility that this Latin verb was seen as a translation equivalent for either Greek verb.

[20]. So Lightfoot; cf. Trench 1880: 204–9 and 318–22, and his longer essay (379–82) discussing all three terms (plus ἀνέγκλητος and ἀνεπίληπτος).

[21]. For data on these and cognate terms see Chantraine 1968–80: 730.

[22]. Cf. Diogenes Laertius 7.155 (LCL 2:259): μέσον τὴν γῆν, κέντρου λόγον ἐπέχουσιν, “the earth is in the middle answering to a centre.”

D. Resumption of Paul's Missionary Report (2:19–30)

[1]. The identification of such a discrete unit was first made by Funk (1966: 264–69), who subsequently provided a more extensive and very careful analysis (Funk 1967).

[2]. Note also Culpepper (1980: 353), who stresses Paul's need for an example that would illustrate his teaching on the mind of Christ.

[3]. ἴνα γνῶτε τὰ περὶ ἡμῶν καὶ παρακαλέσῃ τὰς καρδίας ὑμῶν, Col. 4:8; Eph. 6:22 (both with reference to Tychicus).

[4]. Note that such a background makes unnecessary the view that Paul felt obligated to commend Timothy because the Philippians had negative feelings toward him (cf. Hawthorne). The point of the passage is not that Paul wants to send Timothy but rather that he cannot send him now.

[5]. Mayer (1987) argues persuasively that Paul wished to prevent a conflict between Epaphroditus and the church.

[6]. It misrepresents my position to group me (as does Fee 1995: 273n7) with those who believe that Epaphroditus “failed in his duty.”

[7]. See Appian, Civil Wars 1.97 (= Appian's Roman History 3:179 LCL); more fully Plutarch, Sulla 34 (= Plutarch's Lives 4:433–34 LCL).

IV. Doctrinal Polemics (3:1–4:1)

[1]. According to Goodspeed (1937: 90–91), “there is between 3:1 and 3:2 a break so harsh as to defy explanation. In 3:1 all is serene. . . . But in the next verse he breaks out against the Judaizers with an intensity unsurpassed even in Galatians.” For the argument that modern scholarship has exaggerated the apostle's change of tone, see MacKay 1960–61: 163–64.

[2]. See the introduction, “Literary Integrity.” One need not accept Garland's (1985) explanation of the function of chapter 3 to appreciate the force of his overall argumentation. Specifically, I am not convinced that “the digression in 3:1–21 is a deliberate rhetorical device intended by Paul to affect his audience prior to the direct, emotional appeal in 4:2” (Garland 1985: 173). On the other hand, his article as a whole decisively places the burden of proof where it belongs: on the side of those who claim that the letter as we have it does not hang together as a literary unit. (See now the argument in Reed 1997 that Phil. 3:1b should be understood as an “epistolary hesitation formula,” playing a specific structural role in the transition from 2:20 to 3:2. In contrast, Harnisch [1999: 137] considers Phil. 3:2–21 a separate document, which he describes as “eine brieflich realisierte forensische Apologie” and which can be analyzed as consisting of exordium [vv. 2–4a], narratio [vv. 4b–7, but v. 7 possibly propositio], argumentatio [vv. 8–14], and peroratio [vv. 15–16, with additional comments].)

[3]. Garland (1985: 149) argues that the verb in 2 Cor. 13:11 simply means “good-bye,” whereas here in Philippians (where it is joined by ἐν κυρίῳ) it must retain the meaning “rejoice.” But this argument drives too sharp a wedge between the two senses. The fact that in 2 Cor. 13:11 χαίρετε is followed by other imperatives surely indicates that the meaning “rejoice” is not absent even there. Conversely, the fact that “rejoice” is the predominant thought in Philippians hardly excludes the nuance of farewell. Holloway (2001: 132) believes Paul uses that term with the philosophical seriousness of ancient consolers, who viewed joy as evidence of progress.

[4]. This suggestion, I think, satisfactorily answers Schmithals's complaint (1972: 72) that anyone changing so abruptly the tone and content of the letter would give a reason for the change (e.g., "I have just had news of such-and-such"). My explanation, insofar as it arises from 3:1b, is therefore not purely imaginary. (Cf. Gunther 1972: 87; and see now U. Müller 1993: 12n33; and Bockmuehl 1998: 176.) I readily admit its speculative character, but it should be noted that one need only present plausible (not necessarily probative) explanations for the only attested form of the text we have. At any rate, one of the great mysteries of modern scholarship is how someone like Schmithals—a proponent of radical and unverifiable conjectures if there ever was one—can think of objecting to, and indeed deriding, any attempts to account for the text by means of "psychological speculations."

A. Judaizers as the Context for Theology (3:1–6)

[1]. Tellbe (1994) combines this element with the conflict that probably existed between the Philippian church and Roman society. In his view, the agitators were Judaizers, but part of the appeal of circumcision was that it would identify the Philippian church as religio licita.

[2]. Paul can use the term περιτομή of Jews generally without the pejorative nuance (Gal. 2:7–9; Col. 4:11).

[3]. The gospel was promised by the prophets (Rom. 1:2); it was witnessed by, and establishes, the law (3:21, 31); circumcision of the heart, not of the flesh, makes one a Jew (2:28–29); Abraham's true children are those who, circumcised or not, follow the footsteps of his faith (4:11–12).

[4]. Cf. the full discussion by Ridderbos 1975: ch. 8; note also Hanson 1987: 89–97.

[5]. Pilhofer (1995: 122–26) sheds interesting light on Paul's self-description. Pointing out that the residents of Philippi were part of the tribus Voltinia and had thus both Philippian and Roman citizenship, Pilhofer states that a Philippian citizen whose family name, for example, was Caius would be identified with this pattern: civis Romanus, tribu Voltinia, Cai filius. With a deliberate threefold contrast, Paul replaces Rome with Israel, Voltinia with Benjamin, and his family name with Hebrew (of the Hebrews). Pilhofer (1995: 127–35) then goes on to expand on the issue of citizenship, concluding that the Christians would have been regarded as being outside—and thus as enemies of—the Roman order.

[6]. For an important critique of Stendahl's position, see Espy 1985, who states that Paul was faultless "in the quantifiable Pharisaic sense" (Espy 1985: 166).

[7]. Kilpatrick is followed by Caird (1976: 132–33), Hawthorne, and esp. Garland (1985: 165–66), who argues that no external opponents are in view and that the words reflect no anger.

[8]. Reed (1997: 244–45) questions my use of the example "watch the fire." He says: "It is not the word 'watch' in Silva's sentence that makes people take heed, but its concatenation with the word 'fire' (direct object)." But that is precisely my point. When the verb is followed by a direct object that might indicate danger (as "dogs," "evil workers," and "cutting off" surely would), there is no longer a need for a clause introduced with either ἀπό or μή (Kilpatrick seems to indicate that such a clause is needed for the nuance "beware of").

[9]. This view was forcefully propounded by Fuller 1980: 87–88; cf. also Barker 1982: 9–10. For a critique, see the review of Fuller by Moo 1982.

[10]. See esp. Ridderbos 1975: 154; for a different perspective, see the fine article by Moo 1983. The number of publications dealing with this question has become an uncontrollable torrent, but Moo 1987 is a helpful review. For a more detailed survey, see Westerholm 2003. Cf. also Silva 2004.

B. The Essence of Pauline Theology (3:7–11)

[1]. Fee (1995: 315) rightly warns of the danger that the splendor of this passage could be "lost in analysis."

[2]. See now Hotze 1997: 227–51 for a discussion of this passage as an example, like 1 Cor. 4:9–13 and 2 Cor. 11:21b–12:10, of the Pauline paradox of strength in weakness. For a very extensive and useful exegesis, see Koperski 1996, who includes an initial chapter on the history of interpretation and a concluding chapter on the theological implications of the passage (especially regarding the uniqueness of Christ).

[3]. ἀλλά, μὲν, οὖν, γέ, καί, though καί is omitted by some manuscripts.

[4]. McKay (1981: 296) summarizes the use of the perfect by saying that it “normally describes a state as either present . . . or timeless.” Understandably, Meyer denies that Paul intends a contrast in the tenses here. On the other hand, Schenk (1984: 263) views Paul’s use of the present as an emphatic transition complementing the perfect.

[5]. Chrysostom, without any awareness of controversy, takes the word to mean “manure,” though he makes the curious proposal that the description need not be taken in an exclusively negative sense: “But as the dung was useful in its former state [the chaff], so that we gather it together with the wheat, and had there been no dung, there would have been no wheat, thus too it is with the Law.” Schenk (1984: 265) accepts the reference to excrement yet thinks that Paul’s point has nothing to do with revulsion but rather worthlessness (cf. English slang crap).

[6]. That Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ is an objective genitive (as opposed to the subjective genitive, “Christ’s knowing,” with “me” as the implied object) is confirmed by verse 10, τοῦ γινῶναι αὐτόν.

[7]. Cf. the comments on 2:6–8, esp. 101n17.

[8]. Fee 1995: 321n34 says that “it obviously is not” a chiasm, but he does not tell us why.

[9]. This conception was articulated very forcefully by E. Käsemann in the early 1960s and is summarized in his Commentary on Romans (1980: 24ff.). The most persuasive argument for this view is Hays 1980, though he makes no attempt to account for the connection between δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ and Paul’s use of the verb δικαίω. Elsewhere, Käsemann (1969: 169) himself seems to acknowledge the distinct force of Phil. 3:9. Should not the unambiguous reference in this passage provide a dominant perspective for the interpretation of the ambiguous construction in Romans?

[10]. For quite a different conception, cf. Sanders 1983: 140. After drawing a comparison between 2 Cor. 3:10 and Phil. 3:9, Sanders argues that the distinction between the two righteousnesses of which Paul speaks is not one “between merit and grace, but between two dispensations. . . . It is this concrete fact of Heilsgeschichte . . . not the abstract superiority of grace to merit” that renders the righteousness of the law worthless and the righteousness of God valid (cf. also Räisänen 1987: 410). It is unfortunate that Sanders conceives of the two frameworks—Heilsgeschichte on the one hand and the significance of grace on the other—as either/or propositions. Paul is not concerned about purely chronological differences but about the difference in character between the two ages: the age of the flesh (= self-confidence and sin) and the age of the Spirit (= promise and salvation).

[11]. Cf. Rom. 10:3, τοῦ θεοῦ opposite ἰδίαν, esp. in view of the whole context, 9:30–10:4.

[12]. Cf. especially Hays 1983: 158–67. At a conference in Tlayacapan, Mexico, in which both of us participated, I had the opportunity to express my reservations concerning this view. Hays’s response to my oral criticisms may be found in Branson and Padilla 1986: 274–80.

[13]. When we are faced with a linguistic unit whose meaning is uncertain, that meaning should be preferred that adds least to the total meaning of the passage. (On this principle of “maximal redundancy,” see Silva 1994: 153–56.) Scholars who object to the traditional interpretation of Gal. 2:16 (also 3:22 and Rom. 3:22) on the grounds that it would be redundant operate with an unjustifiably negative understanding of the role played by redundancy in communication. (Hays 1983: 184n80, for example, acknowledges that Paul uses redundancy elsewhere, but adds that his “writing would benefit from the judicious application of a red pencil.”) It should also be noted that objective genitive constructions sound “unnatural” to us (the term is used by Hays 1983: 162), and that fact may lead us to assume, falsely, that an alternate interpretation is preferable. For a more detailed and updated discussion, see Silva 2004.

[14]. So BDAG 412 (s.v. εὐρίσκω, meaning 2, end of paragraph), though the references there show that this usage is attested in nonbiblical Hellenistic sources. Cf. also Preisker, TDNT 2:769 and his references to m. Yebam. 4.1–2 as a parallel to Matt. 1:18.

[15]. Murray (1961: 161) comments that union with Christ “is not simply a step in the application of redemption; when viewed, according to the teaching of Scripture, in its broader aspects it underlies every step of the application of redemption.”

[16]. More particularly, Paul may well be referring to Christ’s resurrection appearance on the road to Damascus. See esp. S. Kim 1982: 5–8, and passim.

[17]. My statement here (unrevised from the first edition) should have made clear that I did not miss the significance of present suffering in the epistle and its relevance for this passage, as Fee (1995: 328n54) claims. Indeed, he misquotes me when he says that I understand “participation in his sufferings” as “spiritual transformation” (I applied the latter description only to the concept of “experiencing the power of Christ’s resurrection”; see above, previous paragraph). In any case, it is very puzzling why Fee, in his exposition, drives such a sharp wedge between the physical and the spiritual and refuses to acknowledge that the parallel language of Rom. 6 may have a bearing on the present passage.

[18]. We may admit, however, that because Paul proceeds in verse 11 to speak of his future resurrection, the thought of his physical death may lurk in the background. Even so, it is doubtful that this clause reflects Paul’s anticipation of martyrdom (as argued by Meyer, Lohmeyer, and others).

[19]. Ridderbos 1975: 206, though it hardly seems necessary to deny a reference to individual conversion. In the words of John Murray (1976–82: 2.279): for the believer “there is a once-for-all definitive and irrevocable breach with the realm in which sin reigns.”

[20]. εἴ πως δύναιντο [optative] καταντήσαντες εἰς Φοίνικα (note the parallel with Phil. 3:11, καταντήσω εἰς). Cf. also Rom. 1:10; 11:14; and esp. Ign. Smyrn. 4.1 (LCL 1:254): προσεύχεσθε ὑπὲρ αὐτῶν, ἔάν πως μετανοήσωσιν, ὅπερ δύσκολον, “pray for them, if perchance they may repent, difficult though that be.” Chrysostom seems to have interpreted the construction in Phil. 3:11 as expressing uncertainty: “he dared not openly assert it” (οὐδὲ ἐθάρρησεν ἀποφύνασθαι).

[21]. Otto (1995) thinks that my interpretation minimizes the element of doubt and that it otherwise makes little sense because all human beings will participate in the general resurrection anyway. His own original solution is that Paul is referring to the resurrection of martyrs (i.e., “the first resurrection” of Rev. 20:5–6). But even if we grant that such an event will take place and moreover that Paul longed for martyrdom (both claims are controversial), it is unclear how the apostle’s pursuit of the knowledge of Christ increases the likelihood of his being martyred.

[22]. Indeed, Gniska (1976: 191) says that the ἀλλά marks the turning point.

[23]. For μὲν γε and μὲν γοῦν, see Denniston 1954: 159–61; and for Demosthenes’ use of corrective μὲν οὖν, see Denniston 1954: 479.

C. Practical Theology (3:12–4:1)

[1]. The similarities and differences between Schmithals and Koester are clearly laid out by Tyson 1976.

[2]. Gunther’s (1973) argumentation is not always persuasive, and his theory may appear extreme and reductionistic (it certainly requires further nuancing). In the end, however, it may prove capable of explaining the greatest amount of data with the least number of difficulties.

[3]. Jewett (1970a: 386) acknowledges that, if his theory is correct, it is puzzling that the Philippians could be attracted to two opposing tendencies; his solution (that both groups appealed to a desire for perfection [1970b: 387]) seems rather weak.

[4]. Other literal uses of the combination are found in Diodorus Siculus, Bibl. hist. 17.73.3 (LCL 8:327; of Alexander’s pursuit of Darius—ἐπιδιώκω is used) and Exod. 15:9 LXX (of the Egyptians’ desire to overtake the Israelites). A metaphorical use (the pursuit of happiness) is found in Lucian, Hermot. 77 (LCL 6:404): “that which very many good and far swifter men have pursued before you and failed to reach” (διώκοντες οὐ κατέλαβον). In Sir. 27:8 we are told, “If you pursue justice, you will attain it” (ἐὰν διώκης τὸ δίκαιον καταλήμψῃ; cf. also Sir. 11:10).

[5]. So Schmithals (1972: 97), building on earlier comments by Ewald (1923: 186–87) and others; this view has been adopted by several scholars, including Collange, Gniska (1976: 198), and Jewett (1970a; 1970b).

[6]. Cf. esp. Meyer, who unfortunately excludes the related ideas, specifically ἐξανάστασιν. Toward the end of his eleventh homily Chrysostom identifies the object of ἔλαβον as τὸ βραβεῖον, but a sentence later he asks, “Τί ἐστίν, εἰ καταλάβω; Ὅπερ πρότερον ἔλεγον, εἰ καταντήσω τὴν ἐξανάστασιν τὴν ἐκ νεκρῶν. τὴν αὐτοῦ, φησὶν, ἀνάστασιν εἰ καταλάβω.” (What is [the meaning of] “If I may take hold of”? What he [lit., I] said earlier, “If I may attain to the resurrection from the dead.” He is saying [in effect], “If I may take hold of his resurrection.”)

[7]. Cf. also my paraphrase above. The English idiom after all in this context has a mild causal sense insofar as it introduces a reason for Paul’s action; in addition to that, however, the idiom is often “used as a sentence modifier to emphasize something to be taken into consideration” (Merriam-Webster’s Collegiate Dictionary, 10th ed. [Springfield, MA: Merriam-Webster, 1993], 21, s.v. “after all”). My paraphrase, therefore, brings out the possible force of ἐφ’ ᾧ as a rhetorical correction (see Bligh 1966: 166). Cf. also my comments on 4:10.

[8]. Taking κλήσεως as a subjective genitive (cf. Meyer): the prize announced or promised by the call. There is thus no need to take the noun as a genitive of apposition.

[9]. Though the fathers were not addressing the grammatical issue, the above inference seems to be the clear implication of their comments. Chrysostom: Ὅρα τὸν εὐγνώμονα [his humility]. Ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ τοῦτο ποιῶ, φησὶν. Similarly, Theophylact refers to the help Christ gives and defines the phrase thus: τουτέστι, διὰ τῆς ἐκείνου συνεργείας (the English translation of Meyer’s commentary incorrectly refers to Theodore rather than Theophylact in support of this view). Finally, Oecumenius paraphrases: ἐν Χριστῷ γάρ, φησί, τρέχω. Even though it may be that the last two fathers were influenced by Chrysostom in their comments, we should still take cognizance of the fact that, as native Greek speakers, they sensed no difficulty in construing the expression with the relatively distant main verb. On the other hand, we need not dismiss the more common interpretation on the grounds that it “yields a superfluous and self-obvious definition of the κλήσις [sic] already so accurately defined” (so Meyer).

[10]. I use the benign phrase “touch of irony” (in addition to the qualifier “probably”) to avoid suggesting that there were any serious disputes between Paul and the Philippians or that the apostle is being sarcastic. At the same time, it is unrealistic to think that any Pauline congregation would have voted unanimously with the apostle on every point. We should leave open the possibility that even in Philippi, a few members of the congregation may have given expression to certain “un-Pauline” ideas (in this case, perhaps reflecting perfectionistic tendencies). For a fine defense of the view that τέλειοι is not ironic, see O’Brien 1991: 433–37. For a more strongly worded discussion, see Fee (1995: 353n10, 358n27), who lumps together opposing scholars, faulting them for their presuppositions, and who seems to suggest that only two options are open to us: either the sharp polemical context of a letter like 1 Corinthians or no polemical elements at all.

[11]. Cf. Stanley 1984: 137–38. He concludes: “Paul’s singular use of imitation and example is the result of his radical insight into the Gospel as the communication of God’s saving power in Christ and his total awareness of human impotence vis-à-vis that divine power” (Stanley 1984: 141). Paradoxically, then, what may appear to us immodest or even arrogant in Paul’s injunction probably reflects his true humility as one thoroughly dependent on God’s grace. See further Clarke 1998.

[12]. This connection was already suggested by Chrysostom. Note also Schenk 1984: 258. Interestingly, Paul uses σκοπεῖτε with the negative sense in the otherwise parallel passage Rom. 16:18.

[13]. Williams (2002: 251) proposes that Paul’s references to the cross involve several themes, including the notion of reversal of values and the effect this term has in polarizing his position over against that of his opponents.

[14]. See the list in Hendriksen 1962: 178n159; cf. also above, introduction to 3:12–4:1.

[15]. For this point and what follows, cf. esp. Schenk (1984: 286–87), who thinks that Paul may be referring, among other things, to the lower digestive system (and specifically the anus; he refers to Mark 7:19), which would suggest a wordplay with σκύβαλα in Phil. 3:8. However, he places even greater stress on Sir. 51:21, “My heart [ἡ κοιλία μου] was stirred to seek her [i.e., wisdom],” and argues that the group in view consisted of wisdom teachers. (For the peculiar suggestion that κοιλία refers to the circumcised organ, see Moiser 1997.)

[16]. In a very thorough monograph, Sandnes (2002) argues that the word belly does not reflect Jewish tradition; it is rather a key term among moral philosophers, applied to people who have not reached the ideal of self-mastery but instead are ruled by their passions.

[17]. The significance of Col. 3:2 for the understanding of Phil. 3:19 is particularly stressed by Böttger 1969: 257–58. He further remarks that doubts about the Pauline authorship of Colossians do not diminish the importance of the parallel.

[18]. If in spite of all these considerations one continues to sense a reference to antinomianism in this passage, we should remind ourselves that immoral behavior has been known to coexist with Judaistic concerns (see introduction to 3:12–4:1).

[19]. δόξα, οὐρανός, ὑπάρχω, ταπεινός, σχῆμα, μορφώω, κύριος. See the fine article by Reumann (1986), which provides a valuable brief history of research.

[20]. Meyer attempts such a connection here: “experiential proof e contrario, and that for what immediately precedes.” This analysis may be correct.

[21]. The meaning “homeland” for this term has been discredited by Böttger 1969. See his thorough examination in the first part of the article, with his conclusion on p. 253 (“Will man bei der Exegese die philologische Basis nicht verlassen, so tut man gut daran, die in der hellenistischen Zeit am besten bezeugte ‘Staat’ auch für Phil 3, 20 ohne jede Modifikation zu übernehmen”).

[22]. μετασχηματίζει: is a contrast intended with σχῆμα in 2:8?

[23]. This verse is reminiscent of Gal. 5:1, about which commentators are divided as to whether it should be linked with chapter 4 or 5.

[24]. On the use of the English perfect, cf. Comrie 1976: ch. 3.

[25]. So López 1975, though his interpretation of the syntax (“I do not, on account of being received, consider myself justified”) is not credible.

[26]. Similarly Schenk 1984: 324; following Böttger 1969: 259. Reumann 1986: 605 shows the unlikely character of this theory.

[27]. BDF §134, though the usual type is that of singular collective nouns construed as plural. Lincoln (1981: 99) calls attention to the sense of βασιλεία as “reign” rather than “realm.”

V. Final Concerns (4:2–23)

[1]. Cf. comments on verse 1. Garland (1985: 160–61) argues forcefully that Paul “intended 1:27–4:3 to be a structural unit.”

A. Exhortations (4:2–9)

[1]. Whether extended ethical instruction should be viewed as a distinct type of paraenetic material (cf. Roetzel 1975: 24) is debatable. In one sense, everything between Phil. 1:27 and 4:9 could be viewed as prolonged exhortation.

[2]. On the significance of women in Philippi, see Malinowsky 1985; Koperski 1992a; Luter 1996.

[3]. Cf. 2 Cor. 10:1, παρακαλῶ ὑμᾶς διὰ τῆς πραΰτητος καὶ ἐπιεικείας τοῦ Χριστοῦ.

[4]. Similarly Lightfoot: “surpassing every device” (though he is more tentative than Meyer). Schenk (1984: 247–48) explicitly denies that Eph. 3:20 is a good parallel and views the verb ὑπερέχω as providing the presupposition for the following φρουρέω. Motivating Schenk, however, is a concern to avoid a certain irrationalism that has sometimes been read into Paul’s words. This concern is justified, but the acknowledgment that some things are beyond our comprehension can hardly be interpreted as a slide into irrationalism. Incidentally, it is clear that Chrysostom understood the phrase as a reference to that which our mind is not able to understand. Among his comments: 'Ο ῥυσάμενος ὑμᾶς οὕτως, ὡς οὐδὲ νοῦς καταλαβεῖν δύναται ("He who has delivered you in such a way that not even the mind can comprehend").

[5]. For a different possibility, cf. Silva 1978: 255, 257.

[6]. Cf. also Betz 1979: 281–83 on Gal. 5:19ff. For an older but clear summary of the material, see Easton 1932.

B. A Word of Thanks (4:10–20)

[1]. Capper (1993) goes so far as to speculate that some sort of “contract” actually existed between the Philippians and Paul, that Paul’s imprisonment must have been viewed by the church as dissolving the arrangement, and that the Philippians had reneged on their obligation (see the criticisms by Fee 1995: 436–37n4). Interest in this passage has been renewed in recent years because it is thought to provide evidence that Philippians (or at least part of it) should be regarded as a letter of friendship. See also the extensive and useful exegesis provided by Peterman (1997: ch. 4), who however erects something of a strawman when he says that the terms Paul uses (esp. “giving and receiving”) are not technical language for financial transactions; most interpreters recognize that Paul’s expressions are largely metaphorical in character.

[2]. My division is admittedly simplistic, especially when one considers Schenk’s (1984: 29–59) extensive—and often illuminating—discussion of the passage’s “Text syntax.” On the other hand, it is difficult to avoid the impression that Schenk has overdone the analysis. For a helpful structural outline, see Fee 1995: 425.

[3]. The best older discussion, though unnecessarily complicated, is found in Meyer. For an extensive, but not always convincing, treatment that also tries to preserve the literal meaning (φρονεῖν ἐπί = take pride in), see Baumert 1969.

[4]. This is the meaning suggested in BDF (§235.2) and in BDAG (365, s.v. ἐπί, meaning 6.c, end of paragraph) for all four passages where it occurs: Rom. 5:12; 2 Cor. 5:4; Phil. 3:12; 4:10.

[5]. Similarly, Schenk (1984: 32) argues that, contextually, μεμύημαι occupies the same lexical field as the two other verbs. Apparently, he allows for no additional nuance (on the grounds that it is impossible to identify what concrete reference such a nuance would have), but perhaps we need not go that far.

[6]. Malherbe (1995: 813, 817) argues that αὐτάρκεια should be understood not in its technical Stoic sense but rather “in the context of ancient discussions of friendship,” which means that in this passage “Paul is not roundabout or oblique, nor does he write a thankless thanks, nor is he embarrassed about money matters. What he does, rather, is to draw out . . . the significance of the gifts as an act by which he and his readers had been drawn more closely together.” In short, “Paul is essentially concerned with personal relationships rather than [Stoic] introspection” (Malherbe 1995: 823).

[7]. Malinowsky (1985: 62) seems to combine both ideas when he says that Paul accepted gifts “only from the Philippian church because the women there would not take no for an answer.”

[8]. Cf. Danker 1972: 96n3. See Meyer on verse 15 for a convoluted discussion about who (Paul or the Philippians or both) is pictured as giving and who as receiving. Such a detailed examination of a metaphor is uncalled for.

[9]. The question arises whether Paul’s language in Philippians has a deeper significance than the simply figurative. K. Weiss (1954) thought so, and the idea has been developed more fully by Newton (1985: 60–68), who argues that Paul saw himself as the priest who received the gifts and offered them in a pleasing way to God: “Now that the Jerusalem Temple has been replaced as the dwelling place of God the offerings of the Christians are real enough for Paul and require certain conditions now that they are taking place in God's Temple, the Church" (Newton 1985: 67). This view deserves consideration, though the evidence appears to me somewhat ambiguous.

Moisés Silva (Ph.D., University of Manchester) has taught New Testament at Westmont College, Westminster Theological Seminary, and Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary. He has written extensively on hermeneutics, linguistics, and Pauline studies and is coauthor of Invitation to the Septuagint.